cook book offered below

—Crisco gives it its delicious richness. Once you make cake with Crisco, you will use no other shortening.

No cooking fat could be daintier or more wholesome than Crisco. It is just pure, refined vegetable oil, solidified by the special Crisco process. There is nothing else like it.

It is white—makes snowy white cakes. It gives cakes the same flavor as when butter is used; all that is necessary is to add a teaspoonful of salt for each cupful of Crisco. It is rich—goes further in everything. It is odorless—and stays so till used, without even being kept on ice.

Try it. See how much better it is for every kind of cooking.

How do you measure flour for cake?

Learn the correct way, and all the other little knacks of making perfect cakes, from the big Crisco cook-book "The Calendar of Dinners," in which Mario Harris Neil, formerly cookery editor of "The Ladies' Home Journal" gives the cooking knowledge that made her famous. Tells how to judge meats, fish, fowl, game and vegetables; what to do and what not to do in baking, broiling, roasting and frying all kinds of food; gives 615 exclusive, useful recipes and 365 complete dinner menus—one for every day in the year. 231 pages. Our Program for 1921

"HERE is a thought for you," says an observant friend of the Christian Herald. "This old world in the last half-dozen years has really lived the full equivalent of a thousand years, if we reckon progress as life."

"Then," we remarked in response, "you agree with H. G. Wells, that 'human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe,' and that, whichever way it turns out, the world is making progress and will continue to progress."

"Precisely," was the reply. "And if you can get people to realize that in that one little group of years, the biggest conceivable transformations have happened—all through intensive education and application—you will be doing real service."

And this along with other reasons is why the Christian Herald's program for 1921 (which is outlined in detail on another page) has the outstanding qualities of novelty, variety, attractiveness and intrinsic worth. It is in large measure a Program of Christian Service for the New Year, and expanded to meet the opportunities of the New Age just begun.

FORTY-TWO years have passed since the first issue of the Christian Herald was printed in New York.

It was a small, modest-looking publication, and from the outset it carried a staunch Gospel message. This is what the announcement set forth of its character and purpose:

"The Christian Herald is the organ of no sect or class; it does not advocate the interests of any denomination or party; we enter into no competition with existing periodicals; but are ready to give the right hand of fellowship to all engaged in the circulation of the pure Gospel."

In all the years since that was written and printed, the Christian Herald has steadily held to its original program of a broad interdenominationalism, and a sound presentation of the old Gospel. Every year has seen its growth and the extension of its influence. And now, with a constituency still rising in the hundreds of thousands, it feels, in facing the new era, a greater responsibility than at any previous time in its history.

A prince had for his motto the words: "I Serve." But it was the Master himself, the rightful King of this world, who laid down the great truth that "he who would be greatest of all must be the servant of all"—a truth which the world has been slow to apprehend. This principle of service is one which has been specially emphasized in the history of the Christian Herald, and which in the coming year will be kept more to the front, if possible, than ever.

AMONG the well-known personalities in authorship, in the pulpit, and in various fields of intellectual and spiritual work, who will be strong features in the pages of the Herald for the next twelve months, are such well-known names as Edwin Markham, who may be called the American Poet Laureate and philosopher; Dr. J. H. Jowett, most delightful and helpful of spiritual writers; Dr. John McNeill, foremost among British evangelicals; Paul Rader, eloquent successor of Dwight L. Moody in the Chicago pastorate, and who is now touring the world on a missionary quest; Sherwood Eddy, delightful in his stories and philosophy of travel and observation; Prof. Albert L. Clay, of Yale, with new findings and new ideas of the ancient peoples of Bible lands; W. E. ("Pussyfoot") Johnson, who will tell what Prohibition is still winning for the world—these and many more, not forgetting Dr. Clark, of the Christian Endeavor, who is writing his world travels for our readers, and our own Dr. Sheldon, whose wonderful series of "In His Steps Today" will be finished during 1921.

In the same category we place Bishop Quayle, one of the most eloquent of Methodists, Dr. E. M. Stires (Episcopalian), Dr. J. B. Remensnyder (Lutheran), Dr. Peter Ainslie (Disciples), Dr. A. C. Dixon (Baptist), Dr. Burrell of Marble Collegiate (Reformed), Dr. John Kelman (Presbyterian), Dr. Torrey and "Billy" Sunday (Evangelicals).

Former readers of World Outlook have begun to enjoy the regular visits of the Christian Herald. They see that the old World Outlook clientele is not forgotten. In the series of articles by Willard Price (formerly the editor of that paper), and which has already begun to appear, there will be a continuous world-view of missionary activities, which none should miss reading.

OF COURSE, the women will form this year, more than ever, an important element of the literary attractiveness of the Christian Herald. Quite a group of new names are likely to appear in this connection, including Miss Alice Robertson, the only woman Congressman, who will tell what she hopes to be able to do for her sex in legislation; Margaret E. Sangster, whose charming sketches, poems and stories are a constant surprise and delight to our readers; and then there is that talented group of women story writers of which Annie Hamilton Donnell, Ida Alexander, Gertrude Brook Hamilton, Jean M. Plank, Ruth Mason Rice and Charlotte C. Kinney, are among the brightest examples—all of these and more will be represented in the Christian Herald during the year.

All who profess to follow Jesus' teachings must now stand together as a mighty army to carry out the mission which He laid upon His church. That mission is "to preach the Gospel to all the nations," and prepare for the setting up of His Kingdom in the hearts of men and women even in the "utmost parts of the earth." This is the great mission of the Church of Christ today, of which hundreds of thousands who read the Christian Herald are earnest loyal members.

It is, however, in the field of Christian service that the great expansion of Christian Herald activities must necessarily come in 1921. With the biggest calamity of its kind prevailing in China, and with distressing conditions in half a dozen other countries, the Christian reader must feel it a duty to be linked up with the service which our country is now rendering to save humanity in these unfortunate lands. Every reader of the Christian Herald can have an opportunity for practically getting in touch with this great life-saving and soul-winning work.

China's great calamity means not only the saving of innumerable lives, but of the winning of multitudes of souls. Our rescue work there, begun by the Christian Herald, has been emphasized and reinforced on a national scale by the Government in Washington, and promises mighty results in which not only readers of the Christian Herald can unite, but all with whom they come in contact, for the true spirit of Christian service is not that it shall be "done in a corner," but in the open light of day.

Prohibition enforcement was no joke to the owners of this wine—ten 3,310-gallon tanks of it—which was used to spray a Los Angeles street, and then flowed into the sewers

Rum-Running a Crime, Not a Business

THE article in the Christian Herald of December 11, "Rum-Running as a Business," is part true, part misleading, and part false. The statements are practically all generalities, with nothing specific to back them up. It is true that the law is violated. The laws prohibiting murder, theft, and other crimes are violated in some places, but no good citizen condemns these laws as failures, or advocates their repeal.

"It took a long, hard campaign to make Prohibition a law," as Mr. McNutt says, and it will take another hard fight to make its enforcement a complete success, as he indicates. No one knows better than the friends of Prohibition that the fight against liquor is not yet over.

Ten states have no state enforcement codes to help enforce the Eighteenth Amendment.

Governor Edwards is still trying "to make New Jersey as wet as the Atlantic Ocean."

Massachusetts voted recently for a beer law in direct conflict with the Federal Constitution.

California on November 2 voted against a law enforcement code.

Milwaukee is in the United States geographically, but in spirit is not a part of it.

Rhode Island is living up to her reputation of being "corrupt and satisfied."

Connecticut is still "buying wooden nutmegs" from the outlawed brewers.

Maryland is trying hard to shake off the ignominy of a liquor-dominated administration.

New York is going through the nerve-racking experience of—the morning after the night before—

Pennsylvania is in the indefensible position of "letting Uncle Sam do it."

Many public officers are still wet, corrupt and derelict. The wets are laying their plans to capture the next Congress after reapportionment.

THESE are some of the many left-over problems of a saloon régime. They furnish no justification for the sweeping allegation that "there has been no Prohibition in Chicago." More than three thousand ex-saloons, now decent places of business, furnish the answer. Ask the people who recently believed Mr. McNutt's statements concerning Prohibition and have been landed in jail by Judge Landis and other officers they know. Mr. McNutt had to rake with a fine tooth comb to find one point where there was an increase in offences. He forgot to call attention to the facts set forth by Judge William

Prohibition a Growth, Not a Fixed Status by Law

By WAYNE B. WHEELER

(General Counsel and Legislative Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America)

W. Gemmill, of the Municipal Court in Chicago, in his report of October 5, 1920.

"Since the enactment of National Prohibition, the total number of arrests for all offences has fallen off about 40 per cent. This includes arrests for drunkenness, fighting, stabbing, shooting, embezzlement, contributing to the delinquency of children, wife and child abandonment, and other kindred offenses.

"In the city we have abolished two criminal courts, located in the worst saloon sections, because there was no longer sufficient business to justify their maintenance.

"Two-thirds of our Bridewell or City Prison, where all prisoners convicted of misdemeanor are sent, has been closed. Before National Prohibition became effective this prison was continuously filled to capacity. (Twenty-two hundred.) For the last year it has averaged about 600. Before Prohibition we had in our Court of Domestic Relations an average of about 40 cases per day of wife and child abandonment and non-support of wife and children.

"In most cases drunkenness of the husband and father was the cause. Now we have less than one-half of that many."

Judge Victor P. Arnold, of the Juvenile Court of Cook County, Chicago, said October 5, 1920:

"Regarding the effect that Prohibition has had on the decrease in juvenile delinquency, and dependency, our statistics, covering the first six months of actual Prohibition, show a decrease in delinquent petitions filed of 37 per cent.

"National Prohibition has undoubtedly removed temptations and has raised the home standards among the people with whom the Juvenile Court touches most closely.

"The record of the Bridewell, which is our House of Correction for men and women, shows a decrease in population of 33 1/4 per cent.

With reference to new institutions, which it is claimed have been built in order to take care of inebriates since Prohibition came into effect, we wish to state that Neal Institute, which was a large private sanitarium, caring for alcoholics, has been closed, and now only cares for drug addicts.

"Washingtonian Home, which was a private institution caring for alcoholics, giving them the bromicide cure, has been entirely closed. This same applies to the Home which was known as The Martha Washington Home for Women."

MR. McNUTT quotes, with an assumed virtue, as he explains away the effects of his figures, that "Arrests for misdemeanors have increased from 28,255 to 35,088 in the first quarter of 1920 in New York." It is true that Tammanyized New York and its liquor-protecting mayor furnish no criterion for judging the results of Prohibition, but it would be fairer to tell what partial enforcement of Prohibition by Federal officers has done even in New York.

According to the statistics in the District Attorney's office, for the first ten months of 1920:

Murders decreased.....	38
Robberies ".....	200
Burglaries ".....	100
Homicides ".....	21
Petit Larceny decreased.....	203
Receiving Stolen Property.....	57

Many other beneficial results could be added.

Mr. McNutt refers to Canada and Detroit to prove that "Liquor is coming into the United States faster than it is being stolen or legitimately withdrawn from the warehouses." He gives nothing to prove this statement. What are the facts? In Canada you can have liquor shipped to your home for private use, except in four provinces. This makes the problem of enforcement more difficult in Detroit, but the whole characterization about the "young farmer boys, high-school students, clerks, delivery boys, etc., going into the business and making large fortunes" is inexcusable exaggeration. This illicit trade is being fought by the Federal Prohibition agents and the Chief of Police of Detroit. It has been reduced over one-half in the last sixty days. Michigan is not impressed with the argument that Prohibition is a failure in that state. They increased their dry from 80,000 to over 200,000 at the and dry election in the State. misleading to say that "Prohibition has been tried, and any judgment of its merits, its virtues, or evils, is impossible." Prohibition has been tried out in most of this country. About 90 per cent. of the territory of the Nation is dry under local or State Prohibition laws. The people experimented with it, voted dry, then wet, compared results, and found that Prohibition actually decreased drunkenness, crime, delinquency, and increased wealth, health and happiness. It is because Prohibition was tried out in most of the territory of the Nation and by over 60 per cent. of its population that we have National Prohibition today. The wet minority of the Nation are now trying it out, and in some places find it hard to sober up.

THE Christian Herald published in its issue of December 11 an article by William Slavens McNutt, designed to arouse the friends of National Prohibition to the fact that the prohibition battle is not over, and that they must push the fight in order to make it fully effective. That article gave the views of a newspaper man who had traveled widely over the country and had seen the law flaunted in many cities. It gave the darker side of the picture. Here we are happy to present, as a complement to Mr. McNutt's account, an article by Mr. Wheeler which shows the brighter side of the prohibition situation. There are many black spots, the battle is far from over, but it can be won if the friends of law enforcement continue their efforts.

IT IS false to say that "all over the country except in the oil-fields a year ago last summer it was perfectly easy to buy liquor." Public officials and private citizens know that this statement is false. There is a large part of the country where it is as difficult to find a liquor seller as a horse thief.

One of the most efficient Prohibition officers in the third largest city in the United States, upon reading Mr. McNutt's article, said: "Many of the statements in this article are not true. To say that it is a perfectly simple matter to buy whiskey is ridiculous. Bartenders scan carefully each customer, and, if he looks suspicious or has a witness with him, he gets no liquor. The fellows who are hanging on in this outlawed trade are leading a dog's life. They make little more than a living with few exceptions. They are living daily in fear of arrest. Let any two or three strangers walk into a liquor joint in a business-like manner, in nearly every instance the bottle of liquor near the drain suddenly disappears, or the whiskey glass already filled is swept aside and the whiskey poured into the drain."

"Over half of the old saloons are closed, or filled with another line of business. Others are closing up daily. This is a sample of how many of these men feel about it. I was raiding a liquor joint, and we had to use physical force to prevent the destruction of the liquor. The proprietor, when apprehended, said to me, 'I am sick of this — business. It is a dog's life anyhow, and, listen to me, I have a fine son and daughter and have struggled to educate them, and want them to be able to associate with nice people. They can not do it while I am in this business.'"

This officer, who is fighting night and day to enforce the law in Pennsylvania, Delaware and New Jersey, said in closing:

"If men like Mr. McNutt will give us the evidence, instead of talking in generalities, and will accompany me with any two of my men, I will prove to him that 'Prohibition is a fact,' and that his statement that 'it is a simple matter to buy liquor' is false."

PROHIBITION COMMISSIONER KRAMER made the following observation on Mr. McNutt's article:

"If one is not particular as to the kind of liquor he secures, or the methods he employs to secure it, he can undoubtedly secure whiskey in New York City, but to say that 'the saloons are open and are selling whiskey across the bar as they did before Prohibition became a law' is far from the truth. Those persons who are selling liquor across the bar have usually a little hidden under the counter which they dole out to those who they know will not give evidence which will lead to their arrest and conviction."

"If Mr. McNutt should care to give the evidence which he seems to have in his possession, I would be pleased to make arrangements to have him appear before the Federal Grand Jury and give the same."

The old form of wet propaganda was: "The Prohibition laws not only prevent a person from getting a drink of liquor, but also prevent one from getting it for medicinal use." We all have read the thread-worn stories about women who became suddenly ill traveling through these Prohibition districts and were prevented from getting one drop of liquor even to save their lives. That kind of propaganda is now being replaced by an equally false one, that "you can buy liquor anywhere." Why not face the facts?

RUM-RUNNING, recently described in The Christian Herald, is not a business; it is a crime. The person who makes, sells, furnishes, barter, transports, imports, or exports intoxicating liquor for beverage use is a criminal. He defies the Constitution and the laws of the United States. He has no more rights under the law than a traitor like Aaron Burr, an assassin like Booth or Czolgosz, or a highwayman like Jesse James.

Patriotic citizens should treat violators of the law as criminals, not as business men.

The stories of great fortunes made by rum-running and illicit liquor dealers are mostly myths. Only a few get rich, and if those who claim to know about their illegal transactions would testify instead of generalizing, these too could be sent to jail. The average outlawed liquor dealer is a sorry creature. Corrupt officials graft on him. He is in constant fear of arrest as the Prohibition officer truthfully said. The jail, the injunction and the prohibitive tax hang over his head like the sword of Damocles.

Federal officers searching the galley of a ship for smuggled liquor

Within the few months since National Prohibition has been in effect, over twenty million dollars of tax has been assessed under the Prohibition Code. The financially responsible violators can be stopped or bankrupted by this one section without any court proceedings.

Over $795,000 in fines have been assessed by Federal officers since Prohibition went into effect.

Over one million dollars' worth of automobiles and property have been seized during this time.

Over 1,700 arrests have been made by Federal officers for violation of the Prohibition law.

This does not include state arrests, fines, etc., which are taken care of largely by state officers in thirty-eight states. Put yourself in a liquor dealer's place in view of these facts and imagine yourself comfortable if you can.

Prohibition should be judged with reference to the stage of its development. It is a growth, not a fixed status by law. Education of public sentiment favorable to the reform is the first step. Crystallizing that sentiment into prohibitory legislation is the second step. Building the law enforcement machinery and putting it into operation is the third step. This is the most difficult part of the task. When the law is enacted, that much of the program is a fact, but it does not constitute all of the program. We are now clearing away the wreckage caused by liquor and uprooting the old liquor system that debauched and disgraced this Nation for more than one hundred years. That system was entrenched in the social, economic and political life of the Nation, and by many it was thought to be a fixture. The power and viciousness of it was revealed in the testimony taken before the United States Senate Judiciary Committee. It showed that this organized traffic had made a survey of practically every state; that business men and politicians were blacklisted or boycotted who dared oppose the traffic. They attempted to subsidize the public press, and were successful in some instances, as the evidence shows. Magazine writers, ministers, doctors and lawyers were employed to advocate that trade. The traffic did not hesitate to ally itself with, and use, the disloyal forces in the Nation in a vain effort to try and save their crime-producing traffic.

This liquor system made alcohol slaves of millions of our people. Many of them will neglect their families, lie or steal if necessary, to get liquor to satisfy their thirst. To uproot a system and a condition like this is a hereculean task.

THE political influence of the liquor interest that dominated this Nation for years is broken. This was evidenced by the last election, when they made a last stand to elect a beer and wine Congress. Their failure was humiliating and complete. It is worth all that Prohibition cost to oust this boycotting vicious system that corrupted the politics of the Nation.

The decreased arrests for drunkenness and crime in the great cities, where it has been hardest to enforce the law, are convincing. Detroit reduced the arrests for drunkenness from 19,309 in the year 1917 to 6,244 this year. Boston in 1919 had 88,593 arrests for drunkenness; in 1920, 47,395. In Baltimore there were 3,992 fewer commitments in 1919 than in 1918, or an average of 270 fewer prisoners a day for the last six months of that year, according to Warden Lee of the City Jail. Not a week passes but that some jail or reformatory closes its doors, or abandons a large part of the institution, for lack of inmates. Deaths from suicide, alcoholism and accident have decreased about 60 per cent. The removal of the saloon as a public drinking place is in itself one of the greatest victories of Prohibition.

Recently in Boston I found that the twenty-six saloons formerly within a few minutes' walk from the Parker House are now occupied by food and clothing merchants. In one section where there were four hundred, all are now occupied for legal purposes except six that are vacant. Multiplied thousands of saloons which distributed daily large amounts of liquor have been supplanted by decent places of business which cater to the comforts and necessities of life.

It is not necessary to accumulate evidence concerning the decrease of crime, misery and poverty; the increase of savings accounts, homeowners, attendance in the public schools and colleges, increased wealth of citizens, and the hundreds of other benefits that come directly or indirectly from the abolition of the beverage liquor traffic. A policy of government that brings these results is not a failure. It can and will be, however, made more successful as time goes on.

There are many critics of Prohibition. Some find fault because it interferes with their easy access to liquor; others are just naturally kickers. They are against the Government. Some expected too much all at once; others talk glibly about the violations of the law, and refused to tell the officers the name of a single place where

Slavery Under the Frigid Equator

The Third Article in a Series on "New Worlds"

By WILLARD PRICE

A LAND which is only a few degrees from the equator, yet as cold as Maine—a land where the streams freeze in the July winter and flowers bloom when summer comes in January—a land far above the clouds, two and a half miles above the average level of the United States, and boasting the loftiest capital city in the world, La Paz, even higher than Lassa of Tibet. Such is the world's roof-garden, where the vast empire of the Incas once stood, on the plateaus of Peru and Bolivia.

If one could pile twenty-five Metropolitan Towers on top of each other and take an elevator to the summit of the stack, he would experience two of the sensations of the visitor to Inca-land.

One would be cold—the other, soroche. The sensation a fish has when thrown ashore must be something like soroche—except that he suffers from too much air, while on the Andean plateau there is not enough. Oxygen is at a premium. The newcomer has a continuous strangling sensation, and if he makes any sudden exertion he comes out from it half-smothered, gasping for air. Although the houses get bitterly cold, fires cannot be burned, for they would take the oxygen out of the air, leaving none to breathe.

Foreign visitors must go carefully, or their lives will be the forfeit. Foreign children born in Bolivia rarely live. Thus it is no mean heroism which takes missionaries to this land.

The native Indians have developed huge chests, encompassing expansive lungs, so that they look for all the world like overgrown brownies, with their squat heads, enormous trunks and spindling legs. They are able to inhale vast quantities of the thin air, extracting from it enough oxygen to keep the machinery of life going. Adapted by centuries to such an altitude, they dare not go to live in the lowlands—for then the great unutilized lung areas become breeding places for disease, and in as little as sixty days' time the Indian will almost certainly contract tuberculosis.

This explains why the descendants of the Incas do not migrate and are not to be found in any other part of the world. If they leave their historic land, death is the penalty.

THERE are a few pure-blooded Spaniards in this country, and many mixed bloods, but the vast bulk of the population is Indian. These are the people whose fabulous wealth and remarkable civilization were recounted by Pizarro—and who were crushed into slavery and penury by this same Pizarro and the other conquistadores.

Some majestic remnants of their civilization still remain, brilliant in contrast with the tragic conditions of today—like gold buttons still clinging to a rotted garment.

Reminders of the past are thick along the shores of Lake Titicaca. This remarkable sheet of water is 150 miles long by two miles high—above the level of our own Great Lakes. I found descendants of the Empire sailing their ships of straw upon its surface, as their ancestors did centuries ago. But now the Indians gazed in dull wonder at our graceless steamer which had been brought up the mountains in small pieces on the backs of llamas and donkeys, was then jointed together, and had since regularly violated the sacred groves of the Island of the Sun with the smudging of soft coal smoke and the racket of machinery.

I remember particularly one evening: The red lamp of the sun was sinking in the northwest; the yellow lamp of the moon was rising in the southeast. Islands about us floated high in the air, entirely detached from the surface of the lake—or such was the optical illusion. The sky was sparkled with brilliant points of light. The old school-book distinction between stars and planets did not hold here, because, in this rare atmosphere, none twinkled. The Southern Cross, looking as much like a giant kite with a boy flying it, dominated the display. Our familiar North star and Big Dipper were not to be seen—buried beneath the northern horizon.

SOUTH of the equator, the seasons being reversed, we were shivering in the ice-cold blasts of wintry June. Garbed in the heaviest winter clothing still I felt it necessary to glue my back to the smokestack for warmth. Lowell's lilt, "What is so rare as a day in June," had always appealed to me as being very beautiful. Now there seemed a note of icy irony in it. A sailor climbed the rigging and took down the hams which had been hanging there all day to refrigerate, and carried them below so they would not freeze solid over night. (And all this even nearer the equator than torrid India and the blazing Sahara!)

The chief engineer opened a bottle of mineral water. The release of the gas made it freeze. The Padre, whose main spiritual care had been that his coffee should be hot (and our half-breed cook had learned to make sure of this before every meal by inserting his thumb into the liquid) danced about the deck doing his rosary as he danced, his long black vestments waving in the wind.

But there was one who seemed oblivious to the cold. He had sat on the floor of the deck for an hour without making a motion. He was an Indian. His ancestors had lived on the shores of this lake.

We passed through a narrow channel between two villages. Here on black nights the captain blows his whistle to make the dogs bark. Then he is able to tell which side is nearer, and steer accordingly. But on this night, the moonlight made such an expedient unnecessary.

THE two huge mountains, one on either side of the channel, resembled pyramids of Egypt, built with a succession of terraces tapering to the summit. Here the Indian began to take interest. He rose and looked, and—what is more rare for the stoic Indian—talked. Through the chief engineer as interpreter, he told us that these elaborately terraced mountains were the ancestral estate of his family and tribe, long since filched from them by the Spanish.

The stupendous remains of a highly perfected civilization were still there—not in the form of great buildings, for the Incas were primarily an agricultural people. Range on range the terraces rose to the peak. In each case the buttress of the terrace was a gigantic stone wall, built of rocks so huge that they could not have been moved without the combined labor of hundreds of men. Then dirt was brought, often from miles away, and filled in to make the terraces. It has been computed that in many cases it would cost $6,000 or $7,000 gold an acre to do now the work that was put upon these hanging gardens of Peru.

The hanging gardens of Babylon were puny compared with many of these. The Babylonian gardens are estimated to have been from seventy-five to three hundred feet high. Many of the huge staircase gardens of Peru, still in existence, are more than five hundred feet high.

And the puzzle of the building of the pyramids is out-puzzled by the mystery as to how the huge rocks in these walls were matched together so perfectly that it is impossible to insert a knife blade or a piece of tissue paper between them. In fact, in some cases the joints are too fine to be seen with the naked eye and a lens is necessary to make sure that there is really a seam. How was it ever possible to grind together with such minute accuracy the edges of stones that weighed tons?

Then to think of all the other great works of these ancients—their tremendous irrigation projects—the way they turned rivers hither and thither at will—their great aqueducts—their magnificent temples—their highly organized social and political systems.

I went below to crawl, fully dressed, under eleven blankets, and reflect upon how thoroughly this marvelous people had been crushed and enslaved.

THE word "slave" is mild in this case. Rarely have slaves been treated so brutally. But "slave" is the strongest word I know, and therefore must do.

They are threefold slaves—under religious slavery, the slavery of ignorance and economic slavery. The last is made possible by the first two. Therefore we shall consider religious slavery first.

After four hundred years of contact with so-called Christianity, religious conditions are worse than they were under the Incas. From more or less simple beliefs, the people have passed to complicated beliefs which have as their basis the money-gouging schemes of priests.

Before a man dies he must confess to a priest. This costs so and so. If he dies without confessing, he must be prayed out of Purgatory. This is a very expensive process. Even if he does die confessing, his future welfare will not be secure unless the priest is hired at regular intervals to sprinkle some holy water on the grave and repeat a pater noster over it.

Marriage is a luxury which only the well-to-do can afford. When the priests charge a minimum fee of eight dollars for a marriage ceremony and a peon earns only a few cents a day, the high cost of marriage is such that most Indian families live and toil and multiply without ever having known the rite.

If a child is not baptized, the priests declare it will be cast into outer darkness—and the fee for baptism is fixed at a little more than the applicant can afford.

Ignorant mountain priests extract incomes which would do credit

A pack train of llamas—these strange animals used so much by the ancient Incas—resting high up amid the mountains metropolitan pulpits. The cura of a village and San Pedro is reported to take in $4,800 a year. The cura of another small village has managed to organize and enforce the local superstitions to such a degree that he derives $2,000 a year from his fear-stricken flock. Weird pagan beliefs are still persisted in by the Indians. The wily priest is not above incorporating these beliefs into his "Christianity" in order that he may have them to compel to his list for fees.

A FOREIGNER who wishes to introduce an innovation such as a trolley line or a steam-engine will do well to see the priest first—otherwise his project will be declared to be "of the devil" and he will have no patronage.

The local priest called upon an American who had proposed putting in an electric light plant. He insisted upon free current for his church. If this were not granted, he would have to notify all his parishioners that electricity was of the devil. The American saw the force of the argument and the free current was supplied!

The greatest financial ingathering takes place on the "Christian" feast days. Then the Indian garbs himself in feather head-dress, hideous mask, and tiger-skin garment, takes down his drum or shrill reed pipe and sets out with his family to the nearest church. There, plenty of alcohol is supplied. When the brain begins to spin, the legs follow suit, and the dizzy dance is on. Even before the altar the bacchanal is continued, accompanied by the shriek and clatter of reed and drum. Men, children, even women with babes on their backs, drink and reel until they fall to the ground in a drunken stupor.

The priest chooses the psychological moment to collect his fees of silver, grain, poultry or sheep, and then rides off to the next church in his charge where this "Christian" celebration is repeated.

"The state has entered into a kind of partnership with the church," says a Bolivian newspaper, "the former to sell alcohol to the Indians (having a monopoly of its sale), and the latter to provide in her festivals the occasion for its consumption."

Such is the slavery of the Indians to a religion that Jesus of Nazareth would never have recognized as containing any of the marks of His own teaching.

The slavery of ignorance spells illiteracy for

Invocation

By HAROLD S. PETERS

THE glowing hope of every glad New Year
Lies like a snow-white mantle on the earth;
Let it not die, that it may give new birth
To that deciding faith which brings God near.

That such a faith in things which are to be
May bloom throughout the world—a God-like right, Given to Man that in far-seeing might
He yet may conquer—this be all my plea.

eighty-five per cent. of the population. One out of every thousand of the Indians of Bolivia is literate. The ordinary Indian has never heard of the "Republic of Bolivia." Needless to say, he knows nothing about the United States. Even the literate Indian has received the scantiest sort of education. One of these did know of the United States, and asked, "How long has Uncle Sam been President of the United States?"

Various attempts have been made to educate the Indian. Such efforts have always come up against a stone wall of opposition on the part of estate owners, who object that schooling will "spoil" the Indians, give them "foolish notions," and make them "feel above their work."

They know they can defraud the Indian only because he is too ignorant to figure the true cost of his purchases at the owner's store, to compute his debt, or to contend for his rights.

A mission school on the shore of Lake Titicaca has had almost insurmountable difficulty in meeting the opposition of white neighbors, who prefer to keep the Indian ignorant so they can exploit him.

The result of fleecing the Indian by taking advantage of his religious superstitions, and of keeping him confined in the prison of ignorance, is that it has been possible to grind the Indian into the most abject economic slavery.

An estate or industry wanting peons will go out and "hook" them; that is, give them enough money to get drunk on, then seize them and carry them off to work out their debt. There the peon discovers that the store where he must buy his food and supplies is under the control of the owner for whom he is working. And the owner charges enough in the store so that the peon can never get out of debt. Since the law requires that he should continue to work until his debt is paid, he works until he dies—or escapes.

Child servitude is common. Nearly every house in Arequipa has a child slave, purchased from Indian parents at an early age.

THIS land needs a great missionary invasion to help lift the triple slavery from the backs of the sons of the Incas. But the number of missionaries is pitifully small. There are more ordained ministers for the State of Iowa than in all South America, with Mexico and Central America added.

In the very few and struggling mission schools, Indian students promptly show their capacity for education. Medical missions are desperately needed. Prevention of disease must be taught. Three out of four of the children born die before reaching two years of age.

Although the need is as great in the interior of South America as in Africa or India, American mission boards do not support one hospital in the whole continent.

Education in elementary hygiene is needed. The Indian occasionally washes his clothes but never himself. He wears a cap with large ear muffs, winter and summer, day and night, in bed and out. He never takes it off. All manner of troubles flourish beneath it.

And, beyond schools and hospitals, the greatest need is for a genuine Christianity.

This land of the sky, raised aloft in the heaven of untwinkling stars, is without the light of the Star of Bethlehem. More of the exports from this part of the world come to the United States than go to any other country. The United States can send one gift in return that will more than repay for all that is received—the Bible—a Book containing a message of new freedom for these enslaved descendants of a once great and free empire.

The Year 1920 Among the Churches

THE biggest and best thing to be said for the churches in the year just past is that they are well on the way to recovery from the effects of the great war. The year previous was, perhaps, the hardest they had known in recent times. Few of them were able, in 1919, to hold their own. Their ingathering was not large enough to fill the vacancies caused by death—and in not a few cases the deaths were twice as large as usual—by expulsion and by losses due to removals and other causes. Denominations representing an aggregate of 41,500,000 members reported a net increase of only 56,000. It was a sore defeat, and it is gratifying to know that all the signs point to 1920 as a year of at least measurable prosperity.

The cessation of growth, even for a year, of the great body of churches in a country of increasing population is very much like the stoppage of heart throb in the human body, a cause for alarm and immediate action.

It would appear that the work of propagating the Gospel among the unconverted was resumed in 1920, the results are so encouraging. A number of the leading churches have made up their membership reports and they agree in indicating that the year has been one of ingathering.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, for example, reports for the year a net gain of more than 183,000 members, at home and abroad. This is the largest increase for a long time. It follows a net loss in 1919, in the United States only, of nearly 70,000.

The Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. (Northern), which in 1919 had a net loss of nearly 29,000, gained in 1920 34,072 which, though not up to the average for the three years preceding 1918, more than make good the loss of 1919.

Other churches, including the Northern and Southern Baptist Conventions and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, have had a good year in 1920, and the total increase of membership in all the churches will again rise in the hundred thousands, and with the gain in church membership we shall have undoubtedly increases in membership in the Sunday schools and Young People's Societies.

IT IS rather strange that the war should affect, the children and young people in their relation to the church, but the figures seem to show that it does. In the Methodist Episcopal Church there was a loss in 1918 and 1919 of 1,274 Sunday schools and 45,160 members, of 60,360 members of the Senior Epworth League, and of 15,558 members of the Junior Epworth League. Such results would seem to be due largely to lack of pastoral supervision and effort. Many churches had to be content with Sunday supplies instead of pastors.

A Look Backward Discloses Real Achievements for the Kingdom

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

That the churches suffer from war is abundantly proved by statistics. The war of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the late War, and even the Spanish-American War, caused decreases in church membership in one of the large popular churches, and must have had like results in other denominations. A study of these losses should unite the churches against war.

The great financial movements of the churches, begun in 1918, have continued to pour their millions into the coffers of the denominations, particularly for missionary and other purposes. Unfortunately, the united effort of many churches to raise increased funds by the Interchurch World Movement, resulted in a rather conspicuous failure. The huge sum asked for was not forthcoming, and denominations which had heavily underwritten the expenses of the movement had large sums to pay.

As the prices of commodities descend, and abnormal profits are disappearing, money becomes scarcer and the collection of subscriptions made on the five-year plan more difficult. The Methodist Centenary Movement, which resulted in a subscription of $108,000,000 (it was first reported at $115,000,000), has returns for the second year which indicate that only about seventy per cent. has been paid in. That is to say, of the $21,354,000 expected the second year, only $15,500,000 has been received. As missionary operations, at home and abroad, had been cast on a scale commensurate with the expected returns, some embarrassment must result.

It is quite probable that when the returns for all the churches are in they will show the largest aggregate budget ever raised.

DURING the year the number of denominations has been reduced by one. The Welsh Presbyterian Church united with the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. (Northern). Negotiations for the union of various bodies bearing the same family name—for example, the whole Presbyterian group—have not yet been brought to a definite conclusion.

The success of the union of three large Lutheran bodies—the General Synod, the General Council and the United Synod South—has been emphasized by the proceedings of the second convention of the United Lutheran Church in America in Washington, D. C., in October. There was no sign of dissatisfaction with the union, or of a coming rift. The spirit of the Convention was joyful as it counted up its gains. One of these, according to a member of the Convention, is that "Lutheranism, through its partial merger, has acquired a national voice. At last the Nation listens when the Church has something to say." Union of synods in various states is going on, reducing expenses and enlarging their power and influence. Recently four synods in Ohio became one. The Convention plans a World Conference of Lutherans in 1922 or 1923. It adopted a declaration of principles defining its understanding as to what constitutes the Holy Catholic Church and its relation to other Protestant Churches, and to co-operative movements among them. It insists that agreement concerning the Gospel and the Sacraments is necessary to organic union and that it can co-operate with other bodies in "works of serving love," provided that such co-operation does not involve surrender of essentials.

The negotiations for the unification of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, have not yet been renewed. The General Conference of the former church rejected last May the basis agreed upon by the two Commissions, but proposed a renewal of the attempt to get together by a somewhat different method.

Increased activity in home and foreign mission fields has resulted from increased receipts from "drives" or campaigns by most of the denominations. Evangelization has been more extensive and successful, largely through pastoral effort. Religious education has advanced and the theological seminaries have filled up. Increase of ministerial salaries has been quite general, and normal conditions once more invite increase of spiritual activities and the full round of church work.

The re-establishment of diplomatic relations by European nations with the Vatican, including the return of France, the "oldest Son of the Church," to intercourse with the Pope, indicate a wise and politic head of the Roman Catholic Church, who has also removed the ban on the visit of Catholic rulers to Rome. The fiction that the Pope is a prisoner in the Vatican may end ere long in an understanding between the Vatican and the Quirinal.

The Russian Church in America has adopted a policy of Americanization, and is hereafter to celebrate its ritual in English, ceasing to be a foreign church, under foreign domination, at least while Bolshevik rule continues in Russia, and endeavoring to turn its communicants toward American ideals.

One thing is increasingly evident, the world is not turning from but toward the Church, and the Church is facing the world with its divine message more confidently and hopefully than ever before.

Church Advertising in Newspapers

How One Congregation Handles the Publicity Problem

By Rev. HAROLD HOLT

The subject of advertising—causing people to turn toward—the church is one of the most interesting subjects there is to the average minister. In any church, in any size of town, the metropolis with its crowds hurrying past the open door, to the small village with people too indifferent to go three blocks to church, the problem of advertising is a real one.

There are a great many different ways of advertising a church, and none of them need be undignified. There is no excuse for dragging religion in the dust in order to have it attract attention. The street akir's methods are not the only methods of advertising. But this article will deal only with advertising in the home-town newspapers—advertising one particular church and in a particular way. We are so restricting ourselves because this one particular way has been found to work successfully in the case of Trinity Church of Niles, Michigan, and, we believe, will work equally well in the case of other churches similarly situated. In larger cities it might not work so well—or rather it would work as well, but would be too expensive, and so becomes impracticable for all but the wealthiest churches.

The particular type of advertising about which we are writing was worked out through the whole of last year. "Worked out" is the right expression, for, while the idea was born whole, the details were worked out by experiments, each experiment being carefully checked on charts, and if successful that detail was kept; if not so successful it was discarded and another detail tried. In this way every detail of the appearance of the advertisements, every line of text, even the length of the reading matter, was worked out as carefully as a laboratory experiment.

The situation was this: A small city of eight thousand; six churches, all more or less prosperous; an old settled element in town, indifferent, watching the procession pass, and content to let it pass; and a new labor element coming in in great numbers with very little use for the churches, the old inhabitants, or anything else except the job upon which they were for the time being engaged.

THE problem that confronted the church was to interest these strangers, not so much in a particular church at first, but in religion itself; to awaken its own old membership to the latent possibilities in themselves and to make them interested in a real sense in the church. Another and equally great objective was to pull the organization together and make it function as it should.

With the assistance of Mr. Benjamin Jefferson, an advertising expert—or rather under his direction with him doing all the work, and the rest of the organization giving him its moral support—it was decided to try newspaper advertising first.

Advertising of the usual sort had been tried before and given up because it was found to have little or no effect. Few of these people that we wanted to reach cared about the text of tomorrow's sermon—they might enjoy the sermon after they got to church, but the clever and rather mysterious combination of words which indicated the subject of Sunday's discourse interested them not at all except as a guessing contest.

Neither did a mere announcement of the services printed in large type, with the name of the church conspicuously displayed over it, draw them.

Both of these types of advertisements worked all right as giving valuable information to the people who intended to come to church and wanted to make sure of the time, or the sermon they wished to hear, but failed miserably in reaching the "unchurched."

THE advertisements which would accomplish this purpose must have several characteristics, which are lacking in the usual church announcement—or so-called advertisement. It must be: (1) Dominating on its page; (2) of a dignity consistent with the religion of Christ; (3) of new interest every week so that it would be looked for; (4) of universal appeal—that is, it must not make any one mad, must not stir up unfriendly rivalry or hereditary prejudices, must not divert a man's mind from the message by bringing in other ideas; (5) stir the curiosity to know what the church is like.

The advertisements as finally worked out incorporated all five of these points. Point number one was easily solved by contracting for a space of thirty inches. That is, thirty newspaper inches, which means a space of three columns wide by ten inches deep, about eight by ten inches, roughly. As the advertisements were to run on Saturday night when the papers have very little advertising (stores as a rule do not use the newspapers on Saturday) we got a cut price for the space. To be exact we got a price of four dollars and a half instead of the usual price of seven dollars. Such a price can usually be secured by the use of a little tact and diplomacy.

The other points were harder to solve and the solution can best be understood by referring to the specimen advertisement printed on this page.

The title is always printed boldly and contains as few words as possible, preferably one. This one is some common word, or a word associated with a homely idea. That catches the attention at once, and has an honest ring about it that every one likes. In this case the word "Limitations" was used. Every one is interested and begins to wonder how Limitations and a church are related. That induces a reading of the text. Curiosity is aroused and half the battle accomplished. But dignity has not been sacrificed in order to do this. Every one associates dignity with a church and while a sensational word would secure attention it would carry with it a slight shock hard to overcome. Remember, we must avoid an unpleasant reaction or aftertaste.

Each week the text of the advertisement is changed, but the space and the form remain the same so that people begin to associate a definite mental picture with our advertisements, yet are always on the outlook for a new message.

LIMITATIONS The eye can detect only a few colors; the ear can identify only a few notes; the hands can touch objects only within a comparatively few degrees of heat; and the brain can hold only a few ideas. We have to know very little in order to think that we know very much. Practically every well known man who at one time or another has been pointed to as an atheist, in his mature years has denied the charge as utter folly. Such men all say in their final years, there must be an Intelligence or there could be no life. Christians feel sure of their Father's love. Perhaps this is the best definition of a Christian. If you have no regular church home come to Old Trinity tomorrow. Service will begin at 11:00 o'clock. Full vested choir. Newcomers are not asked to contribute. Plenty of seats for all. You can arrange for a family pew, if you like. You will be most heartily welcome. TRINITY CHURCH Episcopal Eighty-Six Years of Service Niles, Michigan The Rev. Harold Holt, Rector South Fourth St.

A sample of the sort of advertising which is bringing increasing attendance to one church. The space used is three columns wide and ten inches deep

THE advertisement then goes on to tell about some well-known fact, or usual incident, not too obvious, not too trite, nor too easily moralized on. We do not want our reader to stop half-way with a, "Oh, I know all that already." This incident is then applied in the field of religion. If possible in a novel way, yet kindly and graciously. We never make the suggestion that a man does not go to church because he is an atheist, or because he is indifferent to religion. People usually live up to your expectation of them, or try to.

Our reader has now been led to apply the message to himself—to ask the question, "Is it I," and when he asked that question he is ready to seek a remedy for his deficiencies. And so the Church is now emphasized in a series of sentences which are always the same. This part of the advertisement really is the most important. The mind has been prepared, now the meat of the advertisement must be so presented that there can remain no obstacle to the man's coming into church next Sunday.

First we coined a phrase "Old Trinity." The church really is old as churches in the Middle West go. Some think that it is too old. In fact many of the congregation were longing for a new building. But we have capitalized what was our drawback into our greatest asset. "Old Trinity" carries with it a friendliness and a homeliness that are attractive. You can love an "Old Trinity." And love draws.

And then we had to make it very clear that we were not trying to compete with other religious bodies. Competition may be the life of trade but it is the ruin of Christianity. There are enough of the unchurched in any town without competing for those who are already religious. And so the line is always used: "If you have no regular church home." We do not want those who are already settled in some church home.

THEN we emphasize the choir. Every one likes the music of a well-trained, devout choir, especially one which has its idiosyncrasies of dress covered up in a uniform costume. More prayers lose their way to heaven because the person praying is thinking of the soprano's peculiar taste in hats than through any other cause. So we assure the prospect that he will not be so distracted. Once we ran a whole advertisement about the choir and how wonderful it was. And it was a good advertisement judging by the attendance that morning.

The next line carries the announcement of the time of service. We only announced one service, though we have three during the day, because the mid-day service is the most popular, the best attended and the heartiest. Our neophyte must not be introduced to a poorly attended or very quietly devotional service, at least not until he has gained some religious background and instruction in Christianity.

Then comes a line about which there has been some questioning on the part of people who have seen our advertisements. It looks peculiar, and we are rather proud of it. "Newcomers are not asked to contribute." It originally read "Strangers are not asked to contribute," but was changed because no one likes to think of himself as a stranger.

But, you will ask, is not such a line a very poor thing to have at all? It seems to cheapen the idea of the church—give a sort of "something for nothing," "Religion is free and we need not support the Church" idea. At first glance it does seem so, and because of that appearance we have been criticized.

Did you ever hear the story of the two men who were shipwrecked, and one of them suggested that something religious be done? Neither of them knew a prayer, so they passed the hat. That story really was the cause of that line being put in our advertising.

And so we use that line. We do not want your money, we want you. We do not expect you to contribute to the cause of Christ unless you are Christ's.

THE fifth paragraph is becoming less and less true all the time. When we started advertising, it was all too true. There were far more seats than people. But now—we are seriously thinking of changing that line to: "Come early and be assured of a seat."

But so far we can keep it. And it tells the reader that he will not get there and find every seat occupied by a pew-holder who will not welcome him to sit beside him. You know that feeling. You go into a strange church and the usher seats you down in the far corner or in a very back pew where it is hard to hear or see. And you know why—it is because the other seats have regular tenants who might arrive late and be vexed to find a stranger in their pew. "Plenty of seats for all." We will make them move over for you.

Why, we are so glad to see you that we will even arrange for you to become a pew-holder yourself—you can join the privileged few freely and without any cost. A family pew is a great anchor to the restless religious immigrant.

The next line assures a welcome, and at the bottom, in large type, we let ourselves out with a little boast. The name of the church, a cross-section of its history, and last of all the name of the rector and the address. You see he is the least important of all. It is the Church, the message, the faith, that count above all. So his name comes in small type at the bottom.

AS WE have said before, this is a practical, well-proved system of advertising. Nothing abstract, nothing theoretical about it at all. Every Sunday has been charted both as to attendance and offerings, and the advertising has proved itself. The church is not yet full, it is not yet all that we are going to make it, but it is about two hundred per cent. better in attendance and much more financially sound than it was a year ago, or ever has been except when it had a silver-tongued orator at the head of it, and they are too rare to be dependable as a source of a church's strength.

With these principles in mind any pastor, or intelligent layman, who has a deep and abiding faith in the church and can think in other than trite theological terms and yet be religious, can reproduce the results which we have had. But let me warn you—fifty-two advertisements take a great deal of material, and mean a great deal of work. If possible do as we did, secure an expert to write them for you. You will find that they are more scientifically written, and your gray hairs are fewer.

And finally do not advertise spasmodically, for it is wasted money. Lay out a regular campaign with definite objectives in mind—and carry it through.

President Aids Starving China

Mr. Wilson Appeals for Famine Victims and Appoints Nation-Wide Committee to Collect Funds

THE campaign to save the tens of millions who are starving in China has become nation-wide in character—a responsibility resting upon the entire American nation—through the setting in motion by President Wilson of the machinery to carry forward this great national relief movement as rapidly as possible. The President, having all the facts before him from the Christian Herald and corroborated by other sources, issued an appeal that the people respond generously to this “appealing cry for help” and has appointed a nation-wide committee to bring about the most effective collection of funds and to direct the administering of relief in the famine districts.

One hundred and thirty of the men and women most prominent in official life, in church activities, in business, in education, and in civic and philanthropic affairs throughout the nation were appointed to membership on this committee.

As chairman, the President designated Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, of New York City, one of the partners in the great banking house of J. P. Morgan & Company, and one of the best-informed men in the country on Chinese affairs. Mr. Lamont was a leader in the formation of the international consortium to straighten out the financial affairs of the Chinese Government, in which nearly two score American banks are participating, and has spent much time in the Orient.

The President named as honorary treasurer of the committee, Mr. Norman Davis, Under-Secretary of State. The restrictions on federal officials will prevent Mr. Davis from taking actual charge of the funds, but he will serve as honorary treasurer, and will assist in the campaign in every way possible. It has been through the State Department that the money collected by the Christian Herald for China relief has been forwarded to the district of need.

THE text of the President's announcement regarding China's tremendous emergency follows: “A famine, alarming in its proportions, today holds in its grip several important provinces in China. The crop failure is complete, and the present distress, which is great, is likely, before winter has run its course, to become appalling. In fact, our diplomatic and consular agencies in China inform me that the loss resulting from death in distressing form may run into millions of souls. It is certain that the local Government and established agencies of relief are unable to cope with the magnitude of the disaster which faces them.

“Under the circumstances, relief to be effective should be granted quickly. Once more an opportunity is offered to the American people to show that prompt and generous response with which they have invariably met the call of their brother nations in distress.

“The case of China I regard as especially worthy of the earnest attention of our citizens. To an unusual degree the Chinese people look to us for counsel and for effective friendship. Our churches, through their religious and medical missionaries, their schools and colleges, and our philanthropic foundations have rendered China an incalculable benefit, which her people recognize with gratitude and devotion to the United States. Therefore not only in the name of humanity but in that of the friendliness which we feel for a great people in distress, I venture to ask that our citizens shall, even though the task of giving is not today a light one, respond as they can to this distant but appealing cry for help.

“In order to be assured of the orderly collection of such donations, large or small, as may be offered, I have invited a nation-wide committee, whose names are attached hereto, to lend their aid to this matter. I have designated Thomas W. Lamont of New York City to act as Chairman of this committee, and Norman Davis, Under-Secretary of State, to act as Treasurer.

“I realize that this call, added to those for the underfed children of Eastern Europe and the afflicted peoples of the Near East, and to the needs of our own country, makes heavy the demand upon the bounty of the nation. I am confident, however, that all these pleas will be answered in generous spirit.”

At the time he issued the appeal, Mr. Wilson sent a telegram to each person named on the committee, giving notification of his action and requesting earnest co-operation. In reply to his formal notification, Mr. Graham Patterson, publisher of the Christian Herald,

A picture of famine victims which makes a stronger plea than any words could do at once sent to President Wilson the following telegram, pledging his wholehearted support to the cause:

“I am very glad to accept the call for service on the China famine relief committee. Be assured the whole force of the Christian Herald and its large body of readers will be thrown wholehearted into this great humanitarian cause.”

THE Christian Herald had been active in calling to President Wilson's attention the terrible catastrophe which has overwhelmed the people of North China and in urging him to set up nation-wide machinery for relief on a huge scale. The Christian Herald will continue its fund for famine relief, but in the fullest co-operation with the national committee.

The Christian Herald will be very actively identified with the campaign since Mr. Patterson will serve as vice-chairman of the executive committee and Rae D. Henkle, managing editor, will be general secretary of the committee in charge of the details of the campaign.

China's need is on a scale so unprecedented, so appallingly large, affecting so many millions of human beings, that nothing less than an organization nation-wide in its operations and embracing all lines of business, all sects, all classes of the population, is adequate to the emergency. The entire nation must take part in this philanthropy if the famine is to be kept from taking a toll of life that will run far into the millions.

The sum required to tide one individual in China over the crisis is amazingly small—the cost of saving one life is but a trifle—but 45,000,000 are affected by this famine, there are so many tens of millions to be tided over this time of crisis, that a gigantic sum must be raised in America. And America, remember, is the only hope of these tens of millions of starving humanity. On America, long the best friend of the Chinese nation—on America, which has sent its missionaries by the hundreds to carry the message of Christianity to China—falls the burden of averting the worst disaster in the world's history.

THE Christian Herald's fund has been advancing at a great rate. Each day's receipts have gone well ahead of the same day for the preceding week. There has been a steady upward trend—an upward trend which we hope to see continued for several weeks. The fund has all but doubled in the last week and now is well over the $100,000 mark! It more than doubled in the week preceding. Is it too much to hope—in view of the great cause—that it will double again in the coming week and that our next report will be of a fund in excess of the $200,000 mark? The generosity which the readers of the Christian Herald have displayed gives ground for a belief that it is not too high a goal for the week.

In our issue of December 25, we announced contributions totaling $54,750.86. This is the way the contributions have been pouring in day by day since then:

December 9.....	$7,927.76
December 10.....	8,802.02
December 11.....	5,071.44
December 13.....	17,024.22
December 14.....	6,645.42
December 15.....	9,194.88
Grand total.....	$109,416.60

This is an inspiring showing. The Family Circle may well be proud of it. But, after it, it is barely a beginning, only a few drops in the bucket of China's heart-rending want. The formation of the nation-wide committee does not lessen the responsibility resting on the readers of the Christian Herald—on you who know already of the great emergency—to do all in your power to save lives in China. Rather it increases it, now that the appeal has been made to the entire country, for you have information which enables you to be the leader in having your community do its share in this great work.

There are many ways in which you can help—by giving what you can afford in cash or Liberty bonds; by inducing your church or Sunday school or some of the affiliated organizations to take up a collection; by persuading your farmer friends to make contributions of grain to be assembled in carload lots for special steamship cargoes to be sent direct to the famine district; by interesting your local Chamber of Commerce or Board of Trade in making some contribution substantial enough to represent the humanitarian spirit of your town; by telling the editor of your local newspaper of the crisis, having him publish a short appeal and receive contributions; by organizing a local committee to emphasize the appeal.

The Christian Herald will receive contributions of money or Liberty bonds, and arrange for the handling of donations of wheat, corn, oats, barley and other grain. Address money contributions and information regarding grain donations to the Christian Herald China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York.

America's Duty Toward China

By J. J. UNDERWOOD

GRIM famine stalks through China. Death by the wholesale follows in its wake. Definite figures are hard to obtain in China, and nobody knows the exact population of the stricken provinces, but the most conservative estimates place the number at somewhere between forty and fifty millions. Unless heroic measures are promptly taken at least half of them, and quite likely nearly all of them, will die this winter.

The number who will suffer the pangs of starvation and ultimate death before next spring—unless aided—is equivalent to from one-quarter to one-third the entire population of the United States.

Many are already dead, and no matter what action is taken, it will be impossible to save all of them. Prompt action will save some. To save all is absolutely beyond hope of human accomplishment, for, when I passed through the famine districts last October, scores were dying every day, almost every young girl between the age of fourteen and twenty years had been sold into slavery or worse, literally thousands were in the last stages of malnutrition, and, to add to an already horrible condition, cholera had begun to take its toll.

The trees had been stripped of their leaves, every blade of grass that poked its head through the parched

World History in a New Setting

Analyzing H. G. Wells's Story of Mankind's Progress

By GEORGE H. SANDISON

IT WOULD be difficult to find an author whose writing gives evidence of greater love for the task in hand than we find in a reading of H. G. Wells's new book, "The Outline of History." In his introduction he characterizes his work as "an attempt to tell the whole story of Life and Mankind as far as this can be done in one continuous narrative." And as Mr. Wells has the rare gift of seeing all sides of a great question at once, instead of taking the partial view, the work becomes in his skillful hands one comprehensive story of human progress in education, science, philosophy, religion and government. He brings the reader to agree with him that the real outstanding personages of human history are those who have opened the ways that lead to progress, and who have spoken to the children of men, encouraging them to "Go Forward."

His two volumes are, therefore, a real history of human progress, not of momentary achievement, however brilliant. He is no hero-worshiper in the ordinary sense, but a lover of his kind, who holds that true greatness lies only in those who serve God and their fellow men. In this "plain history," as he calls it, every incident takes on a new interest. It is a rearrangement of the whole system of historic presentation, which would have staggered many of the great historians, and which never seems to have occurred to any of the famous historical writers from the days of Herodotus down to the present. Yet it is a method of literary treatment which the reader finds of absorbing interest.

One of the points in Mr. Wells's philosophy, which he emphasizes early in his work, is to impress the reader with the essential unity of the human race. All are of one blood and kindred, and all their struggles are to be interpreted as tending toward the ultimate recognition of racial unity and common human interests. History receives at his hands a new setting. It is not merely the clashing of rival nationalities or races, or the hard-won triumphs of strength and skill; these become mere incidentals in the greater struggle toward light and freedom and human happiness, the beacons to which he believes that humanity, like the needle to the pole, has been steadily turning, notwithstanding many deviations.

IN THE first volume we have a wonderful, fascinating story of the world in the making, and the origin and distribution of the human race, the dawn of history and the early religions; the story of Judea, Greece and India; the rise, development and collapse of the Roman Empire; and the introduction of Christianity. But it is in the second volume that we find the great theme of the book—the Progress of Mankind—fully developed. With the coming of Christianity great things began to happen. The teachings of Jesus turned the world upside down. The Master was too great even for His disciples, none of whom could grasp the full world-wide scope of His teachings. In His Kingdom there was to be no property, nor pride, nor precedence, and no reward but love. The hearts of His followers must see in every man a brother.

Even today, as the author points out, Christ's teaching is so soul-searching and far-reaching, that our small hearts, however much we may will to serve Him, find it difficult to reach the standard of our spiritual desires. As his work proceeds, the historian frequently reverts to the beauty and world-embracing character of Christ's teaching, which, if at any time applied to the troubles of the world, would have proved a solvent.

As a historian, Mr. Wells judges the leaders among those who are the dominant characters in the story of their times—by the standard of service not to a group or a nation, but to the world. In dealing with the founders of the old religions and philosophies, he searches out their good qualities through which they became helpers to humanity, rather than their weaknesses and errors, which other historians emphasize. The result of this new valuation is to give to a very large part of history hitherto obscured by prejudice, a new and more reasonable presentation.

With the coming of what has been called the "modern type" of civilization, which brought in popular education and the freer teaching of Christianity, there came a new spirit into the world. Europe began to think. Then came the Age of the Great Powers. In England, Holland, Germany and Poland, the republican spirit began to find freer expression. It was a time of territorial rivalry and brilliant conquest. The great scramble for empire overseas was in full swing. It was what the Chinese would have called an "Age of Confusion," and, as Mr. Wells observes, its influence has not even yet drawn to a close. Yet, in spite of all its drawbacks, it must be viewed as an age of progress.

PERHAPS the most effective part of "The Outline of History" is to be found in the last five chapters, in which we find sketched the progress of independence in America, the French Revolution and its influence, the meteoric career of Napoleon, and the "world's increase of knowledge and clear-thinking which distinctively marked the nineteenth century." It was a period big with events. The revolution in mechanics pressed education upon whole populations, and led to wide organization of industries that produced "a new and distinctive system of ideas among the common people."

This age, too, witnessed the development of the Marxian philosophy and the proletariat. There came a great irruption of new social, religious and political ideas into the general European mind.

"No Socialist sect has yet defined its projected government clearly," Mr. Wells says; "the Bolsheviks in the Russian experiment seemed to be guided by a phrase, 'the dictatorship of the proletariat,' and in practice we are told Trotsky and Lenin proved as autocratic as the less intelligent but equally well-meaning Tsar, Alexander I. A revolution can establish nothing permanent that has not already been thought out beforehand, and apprehended by the general mind."

Of President Wilson, Mr. Wells writes with a mingling of honest criticism and undisguised appreciation. "He was the spokesman of a New Age. He unfolded a conception of international relationships that came like a gospel—like the hope of a better world—to the whole eastern hemisphere. His League of Nations was to be the final court of appeals in international affairs. Here again he awakened a tremendous echo. To Europe and Asia he seemed to be thinking and seeing, for the first time in history, things hitherto undeveloped and altogether secret"; but it was manifest that the American people had no mind to a compact "that was virtually little more than a league of allied imperialism for mutual insurance. . . ."

IT IS unusual for the Christian Herald to devote so much space to a single book. But H. G. Wells has done an extraordinary piece of work in his "Outline of History," and Dr. Sandison's analysis of this new presentation of the story of mankind—a record of marvelous progress despite periods of retrogression—gives to it an interest far beyond that of the ordinary book review. Mr. Wells holds that true greatness lies only in those who serve God and their fellow men, and hopes that out of the trouble and tragedy of this present time there may emerge a moral and intellectual revival, a religious revival, which shall begin a new era.

THE closing pages of the second volume of this remarkable history are devoted to what Mr. Wells calls "a stock-taking of the state of mind in which we leave mankind today." And here is where his philosophy becomes clearer and more hopeful and heartening. Human history he regards as in essence a history of ideas, and these tremendous experiences of the late war constitute a crowning epoch. "Never before have men stood so barely face to face with the community of their interests and their common destiny." It has done more than any previous experience to awaken the consciousness of a collective need, and the possibility of a collective effort embracing the whole race. With a world full of physical evils, there is this mental arousal to set against them, and he still finds that the dominating fact is a new sanity that touches all nations in common.

It is a different world from the one we knew before the war, he tells us. The dull routine of those old days is gone. The realization grows that there can be no securely happy individual life without a righteous general life. The absence of any world-wide law, or world-justice, spoils all; yet these are not unattainable, he believes. To be aware of a need is to be half way towards its satisfaction. We call this stirring toward a new order, this refusal to drift on in the old directions, "unrest," but he calls it "hope."

At the same time, he frankly makes the admission that, "having brought this outline of history up to our own times, yet we have brought it to no conclusion." The attitude is one of dramatic expectation. We are the actors in the drama. "It is you, it is I, it is all that is happening to us and all we are doing," which will tell the sequel. "Our wars, our social conflict, our enormous economic stresses, are all aspects of adjustment. Loyalties and allegiances today are at best provisional. Our true State, this State to which every man owes his utmost political effort, must now be this nascent Federal World State, to which human necessities point. Our true God now is the God of all men. Our true nationality is mankind."

To a certain small number of men, the attainment of world-peace has become the supreme work in life, has become a religious self-devotion; but to a far greater number it has become a ruling motive. Religion and education have been the chief forces throughout the great story of enlarged human co-operations. Religious disputation and confusion have had their share in the reversion of international politics toward "a brutal nationalism," and the backward drift of business life toward harsh, selfish, uncreative profit-seeking. One of the results has been what he terms the "real decivilization" of men's minds.

MR. WELLS lays special stress on the suggestion that the divorce of religious teaching from organized education can be only temporary, and that soon again education must become religious in intent and spirit. Then, under favoring conditions, the impulse to universal service, which he declares has been the underlying force in all the great religions of the last 2500 years, will again reappear "as the fundamental structural impulse in human society." He draws these conclusions:

"Out of the trouble and tragedy of this present time there may emerge a moral and intellectual revival, a religious revival, of a simplicity and scope to draw together men of alien races and now discrete disconnected traditions into one common and sustained way of living for the world's service. We can not foretell the scope and power of such a revival; we can not even produce evidence of its onset. The beginnings of such things are never conspicuous. Great movements of the racial soul come at first 'like a thief in the night', and then suddenly are discovered to be powerful and world-wide. Religious emotion—stripped of corruptions and freed from its last priestly entanglements—may presently blow through life again like a great wind, bursting the doors and flinging open the shutters of the individual life, and making many things possible and easy that in these present days of exhaustion, seem almost too difficult to desire."

Mr. Wells does not pose as a political prophet, but rather as one who expresses the world's great longings, and whose confidence in its ultimate fulfilment is unshakable. The League of Nations may or may not prove efficient in opening up the new highway which the world needs, but more than a League of Nations is wanted, he says; "what it needs is a World League of Men. The world perishes unless sovereignty is merged in the nationality subordinated." He foresees the possibility of several partial leagues preceding any real world league.

He believes that the religion of the future will be "a common world religion," pure and undefiled, and will teach the Kingdom of Heaven, brotherhood, creative service and unselfishness. The whole world will be educated—not simply classes and people. There will be neither armies nor navies; no classes, no unemployed, no wealthy or poor. The political organization of the future will be democratic, and direction being in touch with and responsive to the generous thought of the whole population. Private enterprise will be a servant, useful and well rewarded, and no longer a "robber master of the commonwealth."

THESE are a few of the characteristics of the future World State towards which he believes the human race is steadily tending. The climax of the whole will be "the attainment of a Federation of all humanity, with a sufficient measure of social justice to insure health, education and a rough equality of opportunity to most of the children born into the world." This would open a new phase in human history. It will be a world with little drudgery and better ordered than that of today; with few professional fighting men, or none at all; no custom-house officers; a multitude of teachers; world-wide sanitation.

He warns us that one can not foretell the surprises or disappointments the future may have in store. There may be tragic economic struggles, grim grapplings of race with race and class with class; but these may be unavoidable. Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe, yet clumsily or smoothly, the world progresses and will continue to progress.

There is no basis for comparison between Mr. Wells's "Outline of History" and the works of other historians. He has shown the new way, and there will be many who will follow him. In a broad and exalted sense, his book is one of the prime literary products of this remarkable age.

A Great Winter Evangelistic Program

The Best Season for Spiritual Results New York Has Ever Known

By C. A. STARR

THE close of its sixteenth year of tent and open-air work, which is announced as the most successful in its history, finds the Evangelistic Committee of New York City shifting its emphasis to its winter tasks, which call for no less strenuous effort.

When, in the winter of 1904-05, the pastors felt that something must be done to reach the hundreds of thousands who do not enter the churches, they organized as their representative for this work the Evangelistic Committee, although it was always more than a committee and has become an established autonomous institution.

Dr. James B. Ely, of Philadelphia, who had had success in similar work in that city, was called to New York to inaugurate the movement, but the present General Secretary, Dr. Arthur J. Smith, has been identified with it from the beginning. The first year he preached several times in the tents. The second year he was tent evangelist for a short period, and the third year spent a large part of the summer in the tent work. In the fall Dr. Ely resigned and Dr. Smith was invited to become superintendent. He is now completing thirteen years of service with the Evangelistic Committee.

The Evangelistic Committee platform has never been changed since the beginning. It has always considered the Church as the ultimate unit of Christian organization, and all that the Committee has done is planned as a contribution to the Church. In its several departments this is strongly featured. Its Evangelistic Institute, held every Spring, is designed to develop workers within the Church and to make these workers efficient. It takes Christian Endeavorers, Epworth Leaguers, and members of other societies, shows them that the great object of Christian work is the saving of souls, and then instructs them how to go about it.

In the open-air and tent department, the sole object is to enable the Church to reach the people who never go to church and to form points of contact between such people and the Church. The whole effort in the movement is toward the Church, and several congregations in New York City have been formed directly from the efforts of tent and open-air work. Such, for instance, is the Italian Church of the Ascension, in East 106th Street, which grew out of a tent meeting in that section several years ago, begun before the war, with a membership of 800. Its assistance also has enabled English churches in neighborhoods where the population is changing to organize their departments and make contact with the thousands which makes possible for the church an efficient ministry.

The year 1920 was the best in the spiritual history of the work. Up to the end of October there had been 2,947 meetings in 253 centers, with a total attendance of 546,525. There have been many street meetings since then, and the grand total for the season will exceed these figures. Contributions were larger this year in the history of the Committee, except when there was a special gift of $10,000. The amount received in 1920 was $3,500 over 1919.

Results in accessions to the churches, however, are far in excess of any previous year. One church alone has taken in more than 500 new members. This church, the Abyssinian Baptist, Rev. A. C. Powell, D.D., pastor, located a tent, the largest used to date, in the heart of Harlem's colony of 175,000 negroes. For this great body there were only 20,000 church sittings, and the religious and moral conditions had become frightful. There have been many church accessions, a good many wrongs have been made right, and the pastors have been kept busy marrying couples who had neglected it. The wave of radicalism which threatened the neighborhood has been turned back, and thousands are living cleaner lives, because of the tent in the black belt.

On the other end of Manhattan Island, there has been a very different bit of work. Down in the Wall Street district, where, if bond robberies were not exciting the people, it was a bomb explosion, or a hold-up, or some other like event, an evangelist has been telling the story of salvation daily, when the weather would permit, from early Spring. John McKay, the evangelist may have an unusual influence in this district, because he was once a part of the Wall Street section. For a number of years he was employed by a firm of brokers, and later was in the brokerage business for himself; but he was a slave to habit and very much on the downward path, separated from his family, when he drifted in to a service in the Old John Street Methodist Church, and heard Bishop Mead tell a story that sounded like the recital of McKay's own history. In the late night watches, alone in his room, McKay won a victory over habit and sin.

A tent meeting for children. The leader, a Jewess, who is standing just in front of the screen, was converted in a similar meeting

Soon he had taken instruction in the Moody Bible Institute and began evangelistic work. He has traveled well over the country, but he prefers Wall Street as a field to any other in the world, because he believes there are many other young men who are as helpless as he was, and who did not know there is a way of escape. He is speaking daily at Broadway and New Street to an audience of from 300 to 500 clerks and business men, and it is common when McKay calls for those who will line up with God for the things of righteousness, to see fifty or seventy-five, or perhaps a hundred, hands raised.

WORKING in conjunction with McKay, but with the younger elements of the district, is Frank B. Gigliotti, a young theological student who devotes all the time he can spare from his studies to reaching hard cases among the youths of downtown New York, or wherever he can find them. Crap-shooting messengers, boy gangsters, and youths who are unfortunate rather than vicious, are all fish for Gigliotti's Gospel net. There is a cartoonist on a New York publication whom Gigliotti found in rags in Battery Park. He is South American by birth, and soon after reaching America, he had been robbed of all his money and had not been able to get work because he could speak no English. Gigliotti fed and clothed him and told him the story of One who bade His followers feed the hungry and clothe the naked. The young cartoonist entered upon a new religious experience.

There is a former leader of an East-Side gang who makes regular visits to Gigliotti's home to tell him how well he is getting along in the new job, and how thankful he is that someone showed him the "better way." Think of it, a gangster going to work! That alone shows the change of heart which has come to the young fellow.

A street-corner meeting in New York's financial district

Of a different nature has been the work throughout the summer of Miss Martha Lustgarten and Mrs. Rowena Becker, who have been telling Bible stories to the children in the tent centers, and wherever they could get a group together on the streets. Another branch of their work was hunting out the forlorn, disheartened women in parks and on the street, and endeavoring to bring sunshine into their lives. Several women on the verge of suicide were turned from their purpose; some couples were reunited upon a Christian basis, and in almost every instance, the clouds were rolled back and the sunlight of love permitted to shine in. Mrs. Becker has just sailed for the heart of the African Congo as missionary for the First Baptist Church of New York City, which will support her in that field.

UP IN the Bronx the Evangelistic Committee put up a Gospel tent within hearing distance of the county jail, and street meetings were held out on the corner nightly. A prisoner in the jail who had at one time been a Christian worker, but who had fallen and was serving a fourteen months' term, heard the singing. The familiar hymns and snatches of the Gospel message which he could understand brought conviction, and in his cell he knelt and confessed to God and felt the joy of forgiveness and restoration. When his sentence expired, he went to the mission, told how he had been brought back to God and made a public confession, and it is expected that soon a Christian worker will be again telling the story that saved him.

Since the close of the tent and open-air season, the work of gathering together the converts, inquirers, and others interested into Bible schools has been in progress under the direction of Miss Ida Bowne, Miss Lustgarten assisting. These classes are held in church centers where it is deemed advisable, but more largely in the homes of converts who are able to bring to their home persons who could not, in many cases, be induced to attend church. This Bible-class work continues throughout the winter.

AN AUXILIARY department is being reorganized, with Mr. William G. Piguero, as head. Mr. Piguero is a retired architect, a Harvard man, who has achieved success while still a young man, has retired, and will devote the remainder of his life to religious work. He has become director of the Auxiliary Department, as a volunteer, and he is working out a greatly enlarged program.

The question is frequently asked: What does the Evangelistic Committee do in the winter and why does it need money during that part of the year? The Evangelistic Committee does not end its work when the chill days come. It merely changes the character of its work from the streets to the churches and homes. Besides the Bible Class organization, all of which is auxiliary to the churches, it is constantly furnishing assistants at evangelistic revival services, and the Committee's headquarters has become an information bureau to which pastors apply when they want evangelists, singers, church visitors, pastors' secretaries, or other workers. Some of these are the product of the Evangelistic Institute, but information is usually available concerning professional evangelists and other workers of experience.

It is also necessary to recruit the young people from the churches for the Evangelistic Institute, and give to them a purpose, an inspiration. This work last year resulted in an Institute, not the largest in numbers, but the most successful in sustained attendance and in inspiration of any thus far held, and it is possible to say that the Committee sent the young folks back to the churches inspired for service.

These things, however, can only be done when the funds are supplied, to keep the work going, since the Committee does not run in debt, and merely acts as steward for the funds entrusted to it. It needs funds to carry on its winter schedule and there is more reason this year for carrying a larger schedule than ever before, because of the greatly enlarged opportunities and the many requests for assistance which are constantly reaching headquarters. All contributions for the Committee's work may be addressed to Evangelistic Fund, care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

CHAPTER VI

ROSE-MARIE started back from the child with a sickening sense of shock. All at once she realized the reason why Bennie's eyes grew tender at the mention of his little sister—why Ella forgot anger and suspicion when Lily came into the room. She understood why Mrs. Volsky's dull voice held love and sorrow.

And yet, as she looked at the small girl, it seemed almost incredible that she should be so inflected. Deaf and dumb and blind! Never to hear the voices of those who loved her, never to see the beautiful things of life, never—even to speak! Rose-Marie choked back a sob, and glanced across the child's cloud of pale golden hair at Ella. As their eyes met she knew, suddenly, that they were, in some strange way, friends.

With a sudden, overwhelming pity, her arms reached out again to Lily. As she gathered the child close, she was surprised at the slenderness of the tiny figure, at the neatness of the faded gingham frock that blended in tone with the great, sightless eyes. All at once she remembered what Bennie had said to her the day before in the park.

"I love Lily," he had told her, "I wouldn't let nobody hurt Lily! If any one—even pa, as much as spoke mean to her—I'd kill him. . . ."

Glancing about the room at the faces of the others, she saw mirrored the echo of Bennie's words. Mrs. Volsky, who would neither keep her flat nor herself neat, quite evidently saw to it that Lily's little dress was spotless. Ella, whose temper would flare up at the slightest word, cared for the child with the tender efficiency of a professional nurse; Bennie's face, as he looked at his tiny sister, had taken on a cherubic softness. And Jim . . . Rose-Marie glanced at Jim and was startled out of her reflections. For Jim was not looking at Lily. His gaze was fixed upon her own face with an intensity that frightened her! With a sudden inspiration she spoke, directly, to him.

"You must be very kind to this little sister of yours," she told him. "She needs every bit of love and affection and consideration that her family can give her!"

JIM, his gaze still upon her face, shrugged. But before he could answer Ella had come a step closer to Rose-Marie. Her eyes were flashing.

"Jim," she said, "ain't got any love or kindness or consideration in him! Jim thinks that Lily ain't got any more feelin's than a puppy dog—'cause she can't answer back. Oh," in response to the question in Rose-Marie's face, "oh, he'd never put a finger on her—not that! But he don't speak kind to her, like we do. It's enough for him that she can't hear th' words he lays his tongue to. Even pa—"

Suddenly, as if in answer to his spoken name, there came a scuffling sound from the corner where pa was sleeping. All at once the empty bottle dropped from the unclenched hand, the mouth fell open in a prodigious yawn, the eyes became wide, burned-out wells of drunkenness. And as she watched, Rose-Marie saw the room cleared in an amazing fashion. She heard Mrs. Volsky's terrified whisper—"He's wakin' up!" She heard Jim's harsh laugh; she saw Ella—with a fiercely maternal sweep of her strong arms—gather the little Lily close to her breast and dart toward the inner room. And then, as she stood dazedly watching the mountain of sodden flesh that was pa rear itself to a sitting posture, and then to a standing one, she felt a hot little hand touch her own.

"We better clear out," said the voice of Bennie, "We better clear out pretty quick! Pa's awful bad, sometimes, when he's just comin' out of it!"

With a quickness not unlike the bump at the end of a falling-through-space dream, Rose-Marie felt herself drawn from the room—heard the door slam to behind her. And then she was hurrying after waste of broken middle age and the pity of blighted childhood. She had seen fear and, if she had stayed a few moments longer, she would have seen downright brutality. Her hand, reaching out, clutched Bennie's coat sleeve.

"Dear," she said—and realized, from the startled expression of his eyes, that he had not often been called "Dear"—"Is it always like that, in your home?"

Bennie looked up into her eyes. He seemed somehow younger than he had seemed the day before, younger and softer.

"Yes, Miss," he told her, "it's always like that, except when it's worse!"

"And," Rose-Marie was still asking questions, "do your older sister and brother just drift in, at any time, like that? And is your father home in the middle of the day? Don't any of them work?"

Bennie's barriers of shyness had been burned away by the warmth of her friendship. He was in a mood to tell anything.

"Pa, he works sometimes," he said. "An' Ella—she uster work till she hadda fight with her boss last week. An' now she says she ain't gonna work no more 'cause there's a feller as will give her everything she wants, if she says th' word! An' Jim—I ain't never seen him do nothin', but he always has a awful lot o' money. He must do his workin' at night—after I'm asleep!"

ROSE-MARIE, her mind working rapidly, realized that Bennie had given revelations of which he did not even dream. Pa—pa's condition was what she had supposed it to be—but Ella was drifting toward danger shoals that she had never imagined! Well, she knew the conditions under which a girl of Ella's financial status stops working—she had heard many such cases discussed, with an amazing frankness, during her short stay at the Settlement House. And Jim—Jim with his sleek, patent-leather hair, and his rat face—Jim did his work at night! Rose-Marie could not suppress the shudder that ran over her. Quickly she changed the subject to the one bright spot in the Volsky family—to Lily.

"Your little sister," she asked Bennie, "has she always been like she is now? Wasn't there ever a time when she could hear or speak or see?"

Bennie winked back a suspicion of tears before he answered. Rose-Marie, who found herself almost forgetting the episode of the kitten, liked him better for the tears. "Yes, Miss," he told her, "she was born all healthy, Ma says. But she had a sickness—when she was a baby. An' she ain't been right since!"

They walked the rest of the way in silence—a silence of untold depth. But it was that silent walk, Rose-Marie felt after, that cemented the strange affection that had sprung suddenly into flower between them. As they said good-bye, in front of the brownstone stoop of the Settlement House, there was none of the usual restraint that exists between a child and a grown-up. And when Rose-Marie asked Bennie, quite as a matter of course, to come to some of their boys' clubs, he assented in a manner as matter of fact as her own.

AS SHE sat down to dinner, that night, Rose-Marie was beaming with happiness and the pride of achievement. The Superintendent, tired after the day's work, noticed her radiance with a wearily sympathetic

The Opening of the Story

ROSE-MARIE, who has come from her sheltered, quiet home in the country to the Settlement House in the city's slums, clashes at the dinner table with the Young Doctor, an orphan who has had to fight for opportunity all his life. She is imbued with a passion to make people better, while he avows as his only purpose a desire to make them healthier without regard to their souls. Rose-Marie, impatient of the careful guard over her, sets out to show her associates that she can help someone. In a tiny park she interrupts a small boy in his torturing of a kitten, rescues the animal, and wins the friendship of the lad by discovering the one tender spot of his heart—love of his younger sister Lily. She visits the Volsky home, without telling her associates at the Settlement House, and finds it more dirty and squalid than she had dreamed any home could be—the Father in a drunken stupor; the Mother dull and hopeless; Ella, the elder daughter, beautiful but hard; Jim, the elder son, with a nameless menace in his eyes. Lily, the only means through which Rose-Marie can arouse the family to better things, is blind, and deaf, and cannot speak.

A Great Opportunity

THE following letter, received a few days ago, contains a timely suggestion, which we commend to the consideration of those who have not yet taken any definite steps towards mitigating the suffering of the people of China.

"Dear Mr. Patterson: I notice in the December 11th issue of the Christian Herald the acknowledgment of my check of one thousand dollars. I note in the same issue a number of subscriptions of one, two, five and ten dollars, which aggregate a little more than a thousand dollars, these sums coming from the same faithful people who are always willing to share so largely of their little; but where are the many who can, of their abundance, give the larger sums which are needed to avert the greatest calamity known to the human race?"

"I have read many reports which, if half true, will make the number dying by starvation equal to the terrible devastation of the World War!"

"I am enclosing an additional check for one thousand dollars which is my salary from a certain company for November and December, in the hope that it may inspire a number of other individuals, associations and churches to raise similar amounts. Japan is making a house-to-house canvass for the raising of money to feed the starving Chinese. What an opportunity for the Christian Church! Will it rise to this great occasion?"

"Wishing you greater success in your efforts, I am, Yours very truly, R. L."

Brooklyn, N. Y.

The great mass of responses to the Christian Herald's appeal for China's famine-stricken population comes from people of comparatively small means. The writer of this letter, however, believes that the opportunity has come when men and women of wealth should realize that it is both a privilege and a duty to give of their abundance in order to avert a calamity, the magnitude of which is appalling to contemplate. One can not be apathetic in the face of a situation which means life or death to millions of human beings! The case of China is literally without parallel in recorded history; yet prompt action on the part of a few of our millionaire citizens would go very far toward averting the greater horror which the world so dreads.

Many noble gifts have been made to worthy causes by the rich, and their generosity has won them deserved esteem. Here is a cause which far outweighs all they have ever considered—a cause which thus far has been helped largely by the gifts of men and women by no means overburdened with riches, indeed, most of them people of meagre means, but who would give and keep on giving until the blood came, rather than that even one child should perish. There is a blessedness in such giving which, in many cases we personally know of, resembles the widow's mite. She gave all she had, and her heart went with the gift. The "rich, young man" in the Gospel parable, who lived a straightforward life in most respects, could not bear to part with any of his wealth, though we are told he had "great possessions." He missed the grand opportunity.

Our good-hearted contributor, R. L., has shown a fine example of the liberal spirit in giving the equivalent of two months' salary to help save China. Will not some of our wealthy Americans who count their incomes by hundreds of thousands, and even millions, consider the sad case of China and give liberally for her relief? The need is great and the call urgent, for thousands are dying as we write. The rich will probably never have such an opportunity again to do so much good. And let them not forget that it is a case in which "he gives twice who gives quickly."

Discussing Disarmament

WILL the United States join the League of Nations, now that it is becoming clear to all who watch the progress of events at Geneva, that the League is handicapped in its work by our non-participation? This question is being asked in many quarters, but we must let future developments supply the answer. Meanwhile, it is unquestionable that American interest in the League grows increasingly active. When, a few days ago, it happened that the League Assembly took up for discussion the question of disarmament, it found a problem which seemed to be set on hair-trigger springs. Doubtless not only the four great nations, but probably all save a few of the others that are now represented in the League, would welcome any proposition that would give reasonable promise of reducing the heavy burdens involved in maintaining big armies and navies. But the League Assembly turned the whole question over to the Council, with a request that it make definite proposals direct to the governments themselves.

Meanwhile, the disarmament plan has come up in Congress, somewhat prematurely, yet significantly, as showing the vigilant watch we are keeping on the League. In view of an informal suggestion from Japan to the United States that the two governments take a naval-building holiday, the subject was brought up in Congress in the form of a joint resolution, introduced by Senator Borah, providing for cessation of warship-building for five years, under an agreement to be signed by Great Britain, Japan and the United States. Such movements and suggestions, while admirable in themselves as intended helps towards peace, are altogether premature. Secretary Daniels stated before the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives that in view of existing conditions in the world today, it would be "a blunder worse than crime" for the United States to enter into any agreement with two or three governments to stop warship construction now. Such an agreement should only be made by all the nations of the world acting together.

All of which goes to show that there are matters under consideration in Geneva which can not be rightly decided without the co-operation of America. Secretary Daniels, speaking as a pacifist, is yet compelled to recognize "chaos, disagreement and trouble" in the world as being of such moment that there can be no limited arrangement among a restricted group of nations for the purpose of assuring world peace; there must be a perfect agreement which will include all the nations, big and little.

Doubtless there are many who would urge that even at this early stage of the League's existence, with a large part of the world still in turmoil, and with Russia "all bloody, but unbowed," continuous pressure should be put upon any essential movement affecting world peace. Fortunately, a wiser course seems to have been taken by the members of the League Assembly, for they know that success lies in making the right move at the proper time, which certainly can not have arrived, nor will it arrive until the attitude of the United States and its relations to the League are definitely decided.

The "Club" of Life

SENATOR ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, who has made such a record in the Senate against the profiteers as a whole, has made public his intention to introduce a bill in Congress to regulate or put into the public service the important business of grain-buying and take the manipulation of the wheat and corn and food staples out of the hands of men who gamble on the basic needs of the people.

Bread used to be called "the staff of life." As wheat is juggled about in the hands of men who are expert manipulators it is no longer the "staff" of life, but it has become the "club" of life. It is a formidable club to hold up the very bread that is essential. As this editorial is being written the press reports that the effort is being made by the men whose trading in grain will be the object of Senator Capper's bill, to take advantage of a "scare" over the exports of wheat from this country to Europe, so as to realize large sums off the "scare" for themselves.

To the average mind of the average man on the street or in the shop the transactions of men on grain exchanges, and the methods by which prices are forced up and down are mysterious and unintelligible. It is all so involved and technical that even the average business man understands only a small part of how it is done.

But the most uninformed man, whether he is an editor or a farmer or a minister, understands what the thing is that Senator Capper is after. A certain group of men in this country has made it a business to buy and sell grain, especially wheat and corn, on certain "margins" which represent gain or loss, according to a great variety of happenings in the world, the future probable crop, the export market, the conditions of nations that are affected by war or famine, and any sudden change in the market as it may be affected by legislation.

All this is technical to the business these men have built up. We are not passing judgment on legitimate grain business methods, whatever they may be. But here is the main thing that Senator Capper is after, and in it he ought to have the hearty support of every good citizen. The men who use a grain market simply to make fortunes out of "scares" due to shortage of supply, the men who gamble on grain and try to control a fictitious market or price, are men who do no work of any kind to produce the food stuff they are gambling over. They are not producers, they are cunning manipulators. They never lift a finger to grow wheat, to harvest it, to thresh it, to mill it, or make it into bread for consumption. They are simply taking advantage of a great common food which the people will always want and must have, to control certain prices in such a way that without doing a single stroke of useful labor they may get a "rake-off."

This is not business. It is trading in a common need. It is not honest trading. It is manipulation. The press report that the grain men are going to make a twenty per cent. "rake off" (we use the very language of the press report), is a commentary on the use these men are making of a "scare" (we use the press word again), to line their own pockets after beating their opponents, the gamblers on the other side of the market, with a "club" of greater shrewdness. It is time this sort of use of the people's staff of life were stopped. We bid success to Senator Capper's bill.

It Is One World

IN HIS preface to his great work Outlines of History, Mr. H. G. Wells says, "There can be no common peace and prosperity without common historical ideas." Following that thought comes this statement which is being made in this country from the Lecture platform by Crawford Vaughan, former Premier of Australia.

"The malady from which the world suffers today is mainly international. Mankind is one. No one nation liveth to itself alone, nor dieth to itself. Europe offers a spectacle of human misery as bad as ever presented itself within the memory of man. Millions are in the throes of starvation. Little children are dying like flies. Industrial unrest and the dislocation of foreign exchange have the same source. The new principle upon which the new world must be built is comradeship between men and nations."

Slowly the people in different parts of this world are beginning to learn that what affects one people affects all the people. If people are undernourished over in Europe the effect of that condition is seen soon in a lowered vitality that results in a feeble offspring, and the tide of such immigration to this country pours over our own social order dependents that add to the burden of the state. If North China as a result of the famine conditions there should go down commercially, South China will be vitally injured commercially, and in turn America will feel the effects of such a catastrophe.

We are slowly learning that if our neighbor has an unsanitary building near a well on his lot next to ours, our children in playing with our neighbor's children may drink contaminated water and get some dangerous disease and die.

We are learning that if there is a slum in a town, it will contaminate the boulevard. If there is vice in the bottoms, it will spread to the heights. If there is corrupt politics in the lower part of the city, it will pollute the streets and avenues where the churches and beautiful residences are.

We are also slowly learning that if there is race prejudice in the heart of Europe, it will come to America. If there are hatred and selfishness and sin anywhere, they will make themselves prominent everywhere. We cannot build a high wall around America and keep out of it any wrong that may exist anywhere. We can safeguard our laws and institutions, and we can protect in every human way our country from disease and sin, but if there is a wrong anywhere in the universe it will in some shape or other spread out over the whole world. The same law, of course, holds over the right as over the wrong. It also is pervasive. Therein lies our hope. But we must not forget that we cannot, by any cunningly devised laws or barriers, make two worlds out of this one. It is one world, and we are all a part of the whole.

To the Christian Herald:

Though a subscriber of the Christian Herald for thirty years, I have been slow in expressing my appreciation of same. It is becoming more and more instructive and edifying. Dr. Jowett's Sermons and Meditations are helpful, the meditation of November 6th especially so. The stories help to interest those who may not have an appetite for the strong meat and thus maintain an interest in the paper. I can well believe that our paper must be very helpful in rural districts where regular church services are wanting. Trusting that He whom our Lord sent to guide His Church guide and bless you in your work is the sincere desire of an old subscriber.

Disarmament Proposals Are Discussed in Many Capitals

DISARMAMENT proposals before the League of Nations Assembly in Geneva have brought that question to the fore in all the great capitals of the world and have evoked expressions of sympathy in all countries, which give new hope to all those who wish to see the end of big armies and navies. It must be admitted, however, that no movements have been initiated which offer promise of success in the immediate future, but the somewhat frank discussions may clear the atmosphere and open the way for international understanding. For the present the nations are going ahead with the building up of strong forces.

The Japanese Government, through the press, has suggested a naval building holiday, but Viscount Ishii, Japan's spokesman at Geneva, declared it was useless to try to get Japan to reduce her naval or military forces while the United States is increasing her armaments. Japan's naval holiday proposal was opposed by Secretary Daniels so long as America remains outside the League of Nations or some similar association, and he approved another three-year building program which involves the construction of eighty-eight warships. His estimate of the cost of maintaining the naval establishment for the coming year was $679,515,731, exclusive of any sums which Congress may add for new building.

In opposition to this stand, Senator Borah offered a joint resolution designed to bring about an agreement among the United States, Great Britain and Japan by which the naval building program of each nation shall be reduced annually during the next five years to fifty per cent. of the present rate, and pledging Congress to conform appropriations to such an understanding. Another resolution, by Senator Walsh, called for the appointment by President Wilson of a delegate to participate in the formulation by the League of Nations of plans for a general reduction in armaments. Both resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and there was no test of Senate sentiment regarding them.

Little was accomplished toward disarmament at Geneva. A proposal that all nations pledge themselves to spend on armaments for the two years 1922 and 1923 not more than they spend for the year 1921 received strong support, Great Britain being among the nations which voted for it. But, in addition to Japan, France refused to make such a promise, and only a weak recommendation on the subject was passed by the Assembly.

League Plans Credit System

AN IMPORTANT step toward the restoration of normal credit and trade conditions was taken by the League of Nations Assembly in the establishment of an international commission to be banker for European nations whose credit has been severely diminished or destroyed. The scheme, which has been in preparation for several months, was the first work of the economic section of the League. It provides that nations desiring credit shall notify the commission what assets, such as customs duties, railroads or monopolies, they desire to pledge with it. The commission will appraise these assets and authorize the government to issue gold bonds for their value. Business men in that country then can make purchases abroad, and gold bonds providing security will be forwarded through the commission.

This plan may have a decided effect on America's export trade by enabling foreign customers to supply their demands here, and was said to have the approval of American bankers. Poland, Roumania, Bulgaria, Austria, Czechoslovakia and Jugoslavia are the countries which have been most in need of credit, and the plan is intended chiefly to help them to improve their economic condition.

Another important development in League affairs was the Assembly's election of China to a place in the Council, an action which places that country in a stronger position in her efforts to get the Japanese out of their hold on Shantung province. Unanimity is necessary in ballots in the Council, and China can make her influence felt very effectively. Other countries elected to the non-permanent places on the Council were Spain, Brazil and Belgium.

The Assembly also decided to set up an international conference to draft a world-wide standard for the prevention of the traffic in women, and to transfer from the Dutch Government to the League the supervision of the enforcement regulations for the traffic in opium. Austria was admitted as a member of the League without opposition, being the first former enemy state to obtain membership.

Constantine Returns to Greece

FORMER King Constantine has returned to Athens to reascend the throne of Greece, and has been received in the Hellenic kingdom with an enthusiasm which was in marked contrast to the scenes which attended his departure into exile in 1917.

He was accompanied by Queen Sophie and their children, and made the voyage from Venice aboard the Greek cruiser Averloff. His progress from the railroad station in Athens to the Royal Palace was through great crowds, which cheered continuously and seemed delirious with joy at his return.

There had been no modification of the hostility of the leading allied nations to Constantine's return, and the Greek Government faced serious problems, particularly with regard to finances. The new régime was discussing with apparent confidence the floating of a loan in America, since its credit in Great Britain and France had been cut off, but there were no indications from American bankers that such an attempt had met with any encouragement.

A dispute over political questions between the Patriarch of Constantinople and Premier Rhallis was threatening to cause a schism in the Greek Church. The chief point of dispute was the removal of the Metropolitan of Athens, and the Premier announced that he would break off relations if the Patriarch continued his opposition.

Harding Confers with Party Leaders

SENATOR HARDING has been busy, at his home in Marion, in conferences with leaders of the Republican party in preparation for his assumption of the duties of the Presidency. Col. George Harvey, one of the men most prominent in the Harding campaign, was a guest of the Senator for three days, and

MR. AND MRS. HERBERT HOOVER

The face of the former food administrator is familiar to the public, but pictures of his wife have been few. Mr. Hoover is being mentioned for several cabinet posts, but just now his energies are centered in the campaign for European Child Relief among other notable callers were Elihu Root, Herbert Hoover and Governor Coolidge.

The political writers were working overtime in selecting a cabinet for the incoming chief executive, but there was no intimation from Mr. Harding that he had begun serious work on the choosing of his cabinet, to say nothing of having made definite tenders of places. Senator Knox figured prominently in the discussions for the Secretaryship of State, although Senator Penrose was declaring that Mr. Knox's services were needed more in the Senate. Mr. Hoover was mentioned for several different cabinet posts. Senators, however, seemed to be favorites among those who were compiling slates for the cabinet.

Questions of foreign policy have been the principal subjects of discussions in the Marion conferences, according to those who have participated in them. Colonel Harvey was urging on Mr. Harding a proposal for an agreement between nations never to resort to offensive warfare until after a referendum of the people of the nation had voted for war. Mr. Root, who spent several months last summer in Europe in connection with the drafting of an international court plan, discussed international relations; and Mr. Hoover gave information on the economic situation in Europe.

William J. Bryan also called on Mr. Harding by request, and his conference caused much comment in view of Mr. Bryan's standing in the Democratic party and his views regarding peace.

$15,000,000 Fire Loss in Cork

INCENDIARY fires which swept over an area of five acres in the business section of the city of Cork and caused a property loss estimated at from $15,000,000 to $25,000,000 followed the proclamation of martial law in the four southernmost counties of Ireland. Three hundred buildings were destroyed and scores of shops, including some of the largest drapery establishments in Ireland, were ruined.

The incendiaries used gasoline and bombs freely in starting the fires, so that the flames spread with great rapidity, and it was hours before the fire brigades of Cork and nearby cities were able to bring the conflagration under control. A few hours later fresh outbreaks of incendiarism occurred, but were checked quickly. Looting was general, and the thieves operated openly, while the inhabitants were terrorized. Most of the business places had been closed, so that there appears to have been no loss of life.

Despatches from Cork, which is under martial law, did not definitely place the responsibility for the outrages, but it seemed reasonable to ascribe them to the campaign of reprisals which has been the reply of the British forces to the Sinn Fein campaign of assassination. The ambush of two trucks carrying military police was believed by some to have evoked the incendiarism; at any rate, the reign of terror in Cork began half an hour after the ambush occurred. T. P. O'Connor, famous Irish leader, bluntly declared the fires were caused by the "Black and Tans"—auxiliary forces of the Crown—and this charge was corroborated by two members of the British labor delegation to Ireland who visited the city. Sir Hamar Greenwood, chief secretary for Ireland, asserted a belief that the Crown forces had not caused the fires, but promised that if the criminals were members of the Crown forces they would suffer the penalties of martial law.

The Cork outrage was followed by Sinn Fein attacks on police barracks in other sections of Ireland, and the situation seemed worse than at any time since the Dublin uprising of 1916.

For Church Co-operation

THAT the Interchurch World Movement might wisely adjust and conclude its activities was the decision of a conference of seventy men and women, representing the leading national organizations of American Protestantism, held in New York City. The meeting was held under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches to promote mutually helpful relationships between the various organizations. The conference advised that the Interchurch Movement, when free to do so, might well transfer the survey material which it may have to dispose of to the various co-operative agencies of the churches dealing with missionary and educational work.

The conference unanimously adopted the following statement:

"It is the sense of this conference that the churches possess in the existing agencies sufficient organizations for the needs of their co-operative work at present if these agencies are

Are You Ready for the Work?

A Sermon for the New Year

By Rev. J. H.

TEXT. Rom. 1:15. "So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also."

I AM ready!" Mark the quiet, soldier-like assurance of the man. The more I meditate on the later epistles of this great apostle, the more I am impressed with his firm and exuberant optimism. Most men, as they grow older, become negative in their counsels, and the positive tone drops out of their speech. It was otherwise with Paul. As he passed into the evening-time of his days, an added firmness came into his speech, and a more radiant hopefulness filled his life.

None of his letters are more positive than those he wrote to Timothy, the aged apostle offering counsel to the younger one. His word is full of power, and his outlook is without misgiving and fear. And here he stands in my text a veteran, but a veteran ready for the fray, waiting the Lord's appointment to any part of the field.

"I am ready!" Like the firemen at our fire brigade stations; the engine ready; every bit of harness is in its place; the door on the latch; everything ready! "Ready!" Like the lifeboat men on a stormy night, pacing the dangerous beach, with everything ready for the call of imminent need. "How soon can you be ready?" said the Prime Minister of England to General Gordon when he was being commissioned for the Soudan. "I am ready now," he replied. And here is Paul standing at "attention," with his loins girt and his lamp burning, just waiting the word of the King. "Ready!"

Ready for what? "I am ready to preach the Gospel." Is that all? Only ready to preach? I almost wish we had another word to describe the work. The word "preach" is a dethroned word. In popular usage it has come to suggest only a formal utterance, a semi-censorious speech, the act of mounting a pulpit and delivering an official discourse. When a man loses his naturalness and an unnatural gravity comes into his speech, and he speaks to another in artificial seriousness, he is regarded as "preaching." And so the word has lost its juice. And, yet what a great, living word it was as used by the apostle Paul! How much it meant! The word is full of movement, it abounds in joyful haste.

Let me give the significance of it as it dwelt in the mind of the great apostle. Here is a beleaguered host, sad, famine-stricken, despairing. And over the hills come men, in jubilant speed, bringing news of deliverance! "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of them that bring glad tidings!" That is the essence of preaching; it is a hurrying and almost breathless mission; it is one man running with good news to another man who is in sorrow and despair. To preach is to surprise men with a glad and heartening evangel. To preach is to go to the dark, beleaguered soul with the thrilling news of glorious emancipation. "Thy prison doors are open! Arise!"

And so I say we must deliver the word "preach" from all merely official and exclusive use. A preacher is just the Lord's courier, the bearer of the news of redeeming grace. "I am ready," says Paul, "to run with the good news anywhere, and to startle listening ears with the evangel of my Saviour's love."

I AM ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also." He is ready to go to the most difficult part of the field! It might have been comparatively easy to have gone to a village where life went with leisurely strides, and where men and women had time to pause and think. In such conditions the heavenly courier might be well received, and men would cease their leisurely work to listen to his news. But to go to Rome and to stand in the whirl of its distempered life, to move amid a society hardened by pomp and power and empire and victory, was to covet a very difficult post, and to be ambitious for a service of mingled hardship and danger. But Paul was willing to lift his voice amid the tramp and clang and clamor of Rome, and to tell the good news of a more imperial city, even the Kingdom of God.

We must have confidence that our news will awake a response, even in Rome. Already there was a little company in Rome to whose ears the good news had come, and who were living the awakened life. There were even saints "in Caesar's household!"

It is an ill thing when we speak our news in hopelessness. We must believe that, just as the Alpine horn awakes manifold echoes that respond like the tones of a great organ, so the news of grace will call forth from souls everywhere the music of a glad response.

AND what was to be the apostle's purpose in heralding the good news? He had clearly defined it for himself. That is something. I think we should often do better work if our purpose were more definitely outlined. What am I after in this bit of work? What is my purpose in preaching this sermon? What exactly am I seeking for my children? Let us put our ambitions into precise speech, and examine them in the presence of the Lord. What was Paul's ambition in preaching at Rome? "That I might have fruit in you also." Then his aspirations were fixed upon the ultimate product, the last and the finished thing. The ambition of his ministry did not end with the sowing of the seed, but only with the gathering of the fruit. He was not contented with the initial work, but looked forward to the final one. It would not satisfy him to "sow the seed by the wayside fair"; he toiled in the vision of the coming harvest for the Master.

Does this ultimate purpose always fill the mind of the Christian worker of our time? Are we not prematurely contented with less than the fruit? I remember that in my native town of Halifax, there were a number of men who were known as "knockers-up." They were given a small payment by their fellow-workers to rattle their doors in the morning at half-past five, in order that the toilers might be at their factories by six. Many, many times have I heard the resounding clapping of the door, as the hurrying "knocker" passed along. If the awakened toiler turned over in his bed and dropped to sleep again, that was no concern of the knocker; he sped away to the next house and repeated his rousing ministry there. It was his duty to wake, but not to take! His was the initial ministry; he did not seek to perfect it.

Paul too was a "knocker-up"; but he was not satisfied that the sleeper should open his eyes; he would stand by him till he had led him to the Master's feet. The apostle looked for "fruit," a definite and complete surrender of the life to Christ.

The apostle adds to the definition of his purpose in these further words: "To the end ye may be established." He would not leave his converts loose, shaky and uncertain. He would not have them "wobblers," but "established" in the faith. He did not wish to have character that resembled loose sand, but character like consolidated rock. He would wait by his convert until, by the ministry of redeeming grace, the man had become "unmoveable." Such is the end which the apostle sought. Again, I ask, are we always as final in our purpose? When people have been aroused in our great missions, are we as eager and as careful to establish them? This was Paul's ambition if ever the door should open to Rome.

And what preparation did the apostle make for his work in Rome? "Without ceasing I make mention of you in my prayers." He had never been to Rome, and yet he was often there! His feet had never trodden the Appian Way, and yet his supplicating spirit moved about in the imperial city! His prayers were there before the apostle! He was already at work before he began to preach! He was exercising the forerunner of prayer, and he was busy "preparing the way of the Lord."

It is marvelous how prayer gives us a way of approach to those to whom we wish to minister. It is only that prayer endows a man with tact and discretion, and with general refinement of spirit. Prayer lowers the mountains and hills in the way, and lifts up the valleys, and the path to my brother's heart becomes clear and plain. If we wish our good news to sink into a man's spirit, let us pray for its reception even before we bear the news. It is possible to prepare the spring atmosphere even before we sow the seed. Here, then, is Paul with his clearly defined purpose, engaged in this preparatory ministry, waiting in "readiness of mind," waiting in "readiness of will," eager to tell the good news wherever the Lord should appoint him.

NOW for full application of all this. The Church of the Lord is in profound need of more individual readiness. The crying need of the modern Church is for multitudes of ready heralds among the rank and file of its members. Every Christian should be a preacher—not a preacher of sermons but a teller of the good news

Growing in Imprisonment

SUNDAY. Psa. 4:1. "Thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress." The imprisoning experience becomes the minister of strong and healthy growth. When the psalmist drew near to the unwelcome circumstance, its face was filled with gloomy frowns. When it "got hold" upon him, it seemed to cripple and belittle him. It would surely break him all to pieces! And it turned out to be the means of his enlargement. It seemed to shut him in when it was in reality opening him out. The circumstance looked like an instrument of depression, crushing him into the dust, and it was truly a minister of elevation, lifting him into larger circles of life. He was enlarged when he was in distress.

There are untold multitudes of people who have shared the psalmist's experience. Their life was moving in broad, quiet waters of happy experience, and the glow of contentment filled their hearts from morning until night. And then their life became suddenly contracted, and they were imprisoned in gloomy necessity. Their life had been like a boat, sailing along the free open waters of a canal. The boat passes out of the sunny openness into the deep, imprisoning walls of a lock. There is a closed gate in front, and a gate is shut behind. The boat is held in the narrowest and gloomiest confinement. But into the locked circle the waters pour from a higher level, and the boat begins to rise in its imprisonment, and soon the forward gate is opened, and the boat moves out on elevated plane.

And life has its imprisoning locks. God shuts us in. Doors are closed before and behind us, and it is God's hand which does it. We seem to lose our freedom. We cannot go as we would. We lose the open vision. We lose the inviting vista which stretched before us like a shining hope. And then, into our forced seclusion, there come the waters of life, and we begin to rise. We may not be conscious that we are rising, but our ignorance does not affect the reality. When God, the merciful Guardian who watches over Israel, opens the forward gate and restores our freedom, we begin to know what has happened. Life opens out in new and larger reaches.

Who has not known people whose sympathies have grown larger in their sorrows? They have begun to think differently. As a sick friend of mine, who had never been sick before, said to me, "My, but things look differently from the horizontal!"

And so it is with the spiritual world. It often grows upon us when we are laid aside and shut within the narrow circle of distress. We see more of it through our tears. We are brought low and strange new things emerge. I have heard that men who look up from the bottom of a deep pit can see the stars at noon. I do not know about that, but I do know that, when men and women are sunk in the pit of adversity and sorrow, and look up, stars of promise troop out to bring them cheer. They see wonderful things which once were very far off. And so I begin to see the truth of the old Italian proverb—"When God shuts a door, He opens a window." J. H. J.

The Light of the World

MONDAY. Eph. 2:18. "For through Jesus we both have access in one spirit to the Father." Sunlight is of one substance, but of three properties. Its heat, light and power cannot well be separated. Heat rays can be felt, light can be seen, and power realized. God is love and light; Christ is the visible manifestation of both, while the unseen Comforter in the absence of Christ is the power of the Godhead felt in the soul.

Is not the mystery of the sunlight as unexplainable as that of the Trinity? He who hath seen Jesus by faith hath seen the Father, and he who hath the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the spirit, hath felt the Father. Are not those who refuse to look unto the Sun of righteousness like those who refuse to leave a darkened room to see and feel the shining of the king of day? God is manifest in the flesh by His Son; in the Spirit by the Comforter, who testifies to the divinity of both the Father and the Son, and who is to abide with us forever, guiding us into all truth, convincing the world of sin and of judgment to come.

The infinite, greater than His universe, dwelling in light that no man can approach unto, hath made Himself known by Jesus, "the light of the world," and by His spirit of almighty power. E. W. C.

Pilgrims of the Desert

TUESDAY. Acts 8:31. "How can I, except some man should guide me." One of the popular works of fiction of twenty years ago was entitled "Ships That Pass in the Night." It was a clever analysis of the possibilities arising from what we call the "chance meeting." Such a "chance meeting" was that of Philip and the Ethiopian. And yet, as we see how the path of Philip intersected the path of the dusky traveler, we see how carefully the Divine mind had planned and timed that meeting. The extremity and the opportunity as usual came together. To the man anxious to be guided came the man anxious to guide. They passed as ships in the night, but not till they had exchanged gifts and greetings.

If we are to be soul-winners, we must always be prepared to practice. The richest prospects will come from the most unexpected places, and at the most unlooked-for times. Then we should exercise some skill in fishing for men. All will not be so easily led as the eunuch. But if we can blend a good mixture of patience, love and persistence, we will send many on their way rejoicing.

No one can testify much beyond his own personal experience. The reason Philip was able to unfold that bit of Isaiah's prophecy with wet eyes and voice thrilling with emotion, was because Philip knew Him of whom the prophet spake. We cannot tell others what Jesus has done for us, sometimes, because we have never let Jesus do much for ourselves. H. P. H.

Three Things God Is

WEDNESDAY. Isaiah 12:2. "The Lord is My Strength, My Song, and My Salvation." In this verse Isaiah makes the Lord a vital force in human life. The prophet thinks of God as a concrete personality, not an abstract principle. The intention of religion is to make God real to us. God or no God means strength or no strength, song or no song, salvation or no salvation.

In this verse the prophet speaks of God as our Strength. We, therefore, have a right to associate strength with the One who is almighty in power. God Who flung out the worlds, hung up the stars, and holds the seas has no weakness in His nature or in His character. We might also notice that Isaiah is saying more than "God is Strength"; he is saying "God is my Strength," and this possessive pronoun changes everything.

Isaiah tells us again that God is our Song. We have every right to believe that God is the happiest Being in this universe because He is good and because He can do so much good for others. This happiness He can share with us, because what God has He has to share with others who need it.

God is also our Salvation. Here the verb is in the present tense, for this salvation is a present possession. It is not a salvation that has to do simply with Heaven and the future—it has to do with Earth and the present. God is our great deliverer from sin and sorrow and trouble. W. W. B.

Broken Things

THURSDAY. I. Cor., 11:24. "Take, eat: this is my body which is broken for you." How often we have heard these beautiful words at the Communion of the Lord's Supper, where we have offered the sacrifices of a broken heart and a contrite spirit! Is there not a blessing in broken things? We would keep them whole for our selfish enjoyment; but love flows forth from hearts that are broken and our Lord's love finds entrance into the riven side, enriching the soul with its infinite treasure.

Unbroken alabaster boxes are valueless, as many unbrushed flowers are odorless. Broken earthly hopes make room for heavenly riches. Breaking the marble makes the statuary beautiful; breaking the grain gives bread to the hungry; breaking the rocks opens the way to gold and precious stones; breaking the earth gives oil and coal for commerce and comfort. So the breaking of the body of Jesus on Calvary gives the Bread of Life to famishing millions. "He that eateth of Me shall live by Me."

To become like our Saviour, we break the alabaster boxes of loving sacrifice for others, scattering the fragrance of devotion everywhere. The gifts of a little child or of a poor widow are as precious to Christ as the offerings of the rich and the great. E. W. C.

The Path Through the Crowd

FRIDAY. Isa. 50:7. "Therefore have I set my face like a flint and I know I shall not be ashamed." Flint is the stuff the Indians made their arrowheads of. It is about the toughest, hardest kind of stone there is. When an arrow tipped with a head of flint was set free from the warrior's bow, it made a path like a rifle bullet. To succeed in anything you must set your face like a flint.

The text is, of course, part of the Messianic prophecy. It is descriptive of Jesus and reminds us strikingly of Luke's words: "He steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem."

Every strong man wants to run a race. He has a thirst to try his mettle. He wants to forge ahead. And to do so, he knows he must "set his face" toward his objective. Every man who would follow Jesus must make a path through the crowd. The only thing we lose by following Him is what the gold loses by going through the fire—the cross. H. P. H.

The Added Touch

SATURDAY. Mark 8:25. "He put His hands again upon his eyes." It is well to notice that this blind man was brought to Jesus by others. Their names are not mentioned, but their deed is recorded. It is not necessary that our name should be written on history's page, just so the deed of goodness is recorded in the annals of time.

They had to make a special effort to get this blind man to Christ. It is never an easy thing to lead a blind man, but to bring such a one to Christ is worthy of the utmost effort, and it is to Christ that we must bring all those who are spiritually blind in sin and selfishness, for He alone is the cure and the Saviour.

The most significant thing about this story is the fact that Jesus touched the blind man twice. After the first time, the man saw things indistinctly, and others looked to him like trees walking, so Jesus touched his eyes again. Christ is never satisfied with incomplete work—whatever He does He does perfectly, and He did not stop in the man's cure until he could see clearly. It is this added touch that we need in life today. It makes all the difference in the world. Our home life needs the added touch of Love. Our religious life needs the added touch of Spiritual Power. Our individual lives need the added touch of Christlike tenderness. W. W. B.

Wonders of Ancient Cambodia

Enormous Ruins of Temples and Palaces Show High State of India's Civilization 1,500 Years Ago

By FRANCIS DICKIE

THROUGH ten thousand years great civilizations have flourished, faded and been forgotten; their buildings, mighty and representative, have crumbled to rubble and dust. Some have been jungle-covered. On the ashes of others new-sprung races have reared fresh empires which in turn have passed and have given way to ever new civilizations pressing on down through all the ages.

A few of these wonders, however, have defied time's erosion, and remained for thousands of years almost intact. One of the most interesting of these, and one worthy of particular attention at this time when the coming of peace has permitted the resumption of the splendid reclamation work being carried on by the French Colonial Government, which was halted during the five years of European hostilities, is the ancient city of Angkor Thom and the temple of Angkor Watt, in French Indo-China. Here a mighty metropolis still remains with many temples. Some of the buildings and city's walls are still in a fair state of preservation.

In Cambodia, now a part of French Indo-China, some 1500 years ago, was built one of the finest of the early civilizations. Huge edifices and beautiful works of stone, adorned with sculptured bas-reliefs of a high order, showing an advanced state of art and architecture even in those distant days, are in evidence throughout the city and in the enormous temple a mile outside the gates.

The civilization was known as the Khmer Empire, and originated in a small band of Hindustan adventurers who journeyed to Cambodia about the fifth century, A.D., and founded a great empire.

For a period of a thousand years the descendants of these men, who mixed with the native races, built up a wonderful nation and reared marvelous cities and temples.

THE ancient city of Angkor Thom is surrounded by a wide moat, flanked by an enormously thick defensive wall. Upon the top of the wall two trains might pass. The wall is rectangular in shape, reaching two miles in each direction, but much of it has not yet been reclaimed from the jungle. Entrance through this wall is gained by five colossal gates, surmounted by towers, each one about thirty feet high. On each of the four sides of the towers is sculptured a face of Buddha, remarkable pieces of work, in that they show so well the calm and placidity which is so marked a part of all representations of this deity of the East.

The city was captured and looted by the Siamese in 1373. This marked the fall of the Empire. The city became deserted and was given over to jungle, until the French Colonial authorities began work a little over a quarter of a century ago to reclaim some of the principal parts of interest, which work has been going on slowly but surely and carefully.

In the very center of the city is the Bayon Temple. It is built on terraces artificially reared on the level plain, a tremendous work that must have required the labor of countless thousands of men over many years. It has ninety-one towers, upon the face of each being carved the face of Brahma. This is a striking evidence of how one religion supplanted another through the centuries in which this city was reaching completion.

Near it, on another vast artificial terrace, stands

The Preasat tower of the temple is 250 feet high and is reached by a flight of steps forty feet high the remains of a palace inhabited by many kings. It is mostly ruin today. But the facing of the terrace upon which it stands carries one of the most remarkable pieces of ancient sculpture in the world. Here is carved a procession of elephants nearly one-half life-size. It extends for a distance of a quarter of a mile. The execution of this procession was a particularly difficult feat, in that the stones making up the carving of each individual elephant, about a dozen stones to each animal, were carved separately and then fitted in afterward. Despite this there are no unsymmetrical lines, and the whole procession is faultless in finish.

NONE of the structures within the city, however, nearly approaches in grandeur the temple of Angkor Watt, which stands a mile without the gate. This noblest monument from those ancient hands was constructed entirely of a fine-grained sandstone, brought by elephants from quarries fifteen miles distant. Three hundred years were required to complete the temple, and it had scarcely been finished when the Siamese invaded the region in 1373, after which time the place became deserted. The jungle encroached upon the buildings until a little over a quarter of a century ago when work was begun to reclaim these ancient wonders.

The chief entrance to the temple of Angkor Watt is from the west. A flagged highway leads over the moat to a great outer rectangular colonnaded gallery three hundred yards in length, as seen in the photograph at the top of this page. Into this gallery five doors open. These doors are set high and reached by flights of steps. At stated intervals along the gallery are standing gigantic stone deities represented in the Hindu pantheon. One of them is a six-armed statue which was visited by countless childless women, who sought to propitiate the gods with offerings of their hair in the hope the god would grant children to them.

Passing through the central doorway of the outer gallery, a temple visitor comes upon another broad flagged highway, and is still a quarter of a mile away from the main temple. Some idea of the millions on millions of feet which have trod this highway in the long ago may be gained when it is explained that some of the grooves in the highway, which is shown at the bottom of the page, were made by the wearing away of the stone from the passing of human feet. This roadway is bordered with tanks along which once ran a stone balustrade representing the king cobra with heads every half-dozen feet. The balustrade was badly broken, but will eventually be repaired. Inside the gallery of the temple proper is a courtyard from which rise three terraces, surrounded by other colonnaded galleries and cloisters, all a mass of sculpture. The last gallery is reached by a flight of steps forty feet high, on which rises the Preasat tower, some 250 feet high, of elaborate architecture, as shown in the illustration in the center of the page.

The passing of millions of human feet has worn deep grooves in this stone highway which leads up to the main temple. All this is enclosed within a huge colonnaded gallery

DURING the centuries since they were deserted, the city of Angkor Thom and the temple of Angkor Watt were largely overgrown with various jungle plants and trees, the most destructive of which was the banyan tree. With its aerial roots finding place on top of walls and in the unmoistened interstices of galleries, the banyan tree burst many places in the walls. Other trees and shrubs and flowers did much damage along with this, and in its wake.

fields had been promptly pounced upon for human food, and the people were trying to subsist on bark and roots. Their cattle had been driven off by profiteers, their clothes had been sold, and the surplus women had shared the same fate. When I left China the price for girls in the famine districts was about $2.00 each. The people are now without clothing, without food and without fuel. Unless the United States comes to their assistance, they are without hope and inevitably will perish, for winter is now upon them.

TO BE sure, the United States already has done something. The American Red Cross sent a contribution of $500,000, and shortly before I left China, Major Emmett C. White, chief of the insular division of that organization, had been given full and complete control of a small section of country containing between 75,000 and 100,000 people, and J. E. Baker, formerly of the Southern Pacific and now adviser to the Chinese railroad board of the minister of communications had been given carte blanche by the Peking government to do what he could to relieve the situation in the way of furnishing transportation. Mr. Baker is one of the "livest wires" in China. He knows the Chinese and knows how to deal with them.

It is highly probable that all of the people in the district in which the Red Cross is working will be saved, but this district is relatively only a pin-prick on the map.

The Chinese are inured to physical suffering and have little fear of death.

A Chinese who spoke fairly good pidgin-English told me a whole family had just died of cholera. "When the stomach is empty," he said, "disease finds easy victims."

At one place, in Chihli, I saw a tatterdermalion with arms and legs asprawl at the side of the roadway. He was in the last stages. A little further on I saw another. His head was resting on a pole stretched between two baskets. I was told that he had been trying to make his way to Tientsin to beg, but had passed out on the way.

On the road between Peking and Tientsin I saw a family—man, wife and a child about ten years old. All were emaciated, and the girl apparently was dying. The mother held the girl's skinny form in her arms and crooned over it. They were doubtless among those who had come from the famine districts to Peking and other cities to beg, but had been driven out by the professional beggars.

The Peking government, which ostensibly controls Northern China, is not noted for its efficiency. It has placed a special tax on railroad tickets and other commodities to raise a fund for the relief of the famine district. But taxes in China somehow have a habit of finding their way into the pockets of those for whom they were not intended, and the same is true in a lesser degree of other things.

The Chinese make a specialty of conversation rather than action. In Peking, they were calling many meetings, indulging in much talk about building roads through the famine districts and laying out irrigation plans that would prevent future famines, and accomplish all sorts of wonderful things. There is only one thing wrong with these plans, and that is by the time the Chinese get ready to carry them out all of whom it is intended to benefit will be dead.

WHEN I left China early last November, famine was prevalent in four provinces—Shantung, Honan, Chihli and Shansi. Newspaper dispatches indicate that it has spread to other provinces. I would be very much surprised if it had not, for in all of the provinces in this region the sparse crops already were shriveling and there was little hope that they would mature.

It was hoped that fall rains would give the stricken people an opportunity to mature buckwheat and sweet potatoes in sufficient quantities to get through the winter, but as these crops withered, hope faded. The result is that a region roughly three hundred miles north of the Yellow River and one hundred miles south of it and extending from close to the east coast westward, nobody seemed to know quite how far, is without food, without fuel, and without blankets or clothing. In this area there lived last Spring a population estimated at 50,000,000.

That many of these are dead is certain. Many had died before I left China. The first sting of frost was then in the air, and now winter is upon them, and their suffering must be beyond human comprehension.

Communication in China is not easy. There are few railroads and the affected provinces are practically without either postal, telegraph or telephone facilities. Literally thousands of impoverished families, who had sold off their land and their belongings to get temporary relief from hunger, were aimlessly wandering in a vain search for help. In most cases these migrations simply led them away from home to die.

LEAVING altogether out of consideration the humanitarian standpoint of this colossal tragedy, what this means in an economic way to the United States is vaguely felt by some commercial interests in this country, but is only fully realized by those in close touch with Chinese affairs. The price of food in China when I left was about double what it had been a few months before. There had been abundant crops on the great Manchurian plain this year, but China, in the matter of food is always just about two hops ahead of the sheriff. It has just enough food to subsist upon and a drought or crop failure is inevitably followed by food shortage. It can be written down as a positive fact that if rural China starves this year urban China will starve next year. The vast population of Chinese craftsmen are absolutely dependent upon the Chinese farmers for food. The surplus product of the producing class of China, outside the farmers, are the keystone of the arch upon which American commerce with China rests.

This commerce last year aggregated $346,271,376. Unless the famine can be effectively countered, it can be set down as certain that China's commerce with the United States next year will vanish. American ships now engaged in the China trade will float idly at their moorings, and American manufacturers who depend upon China for trade will have to seek new customers in another country.

Part of the people in the famine district can yet be saved, but it will take millions of dollars to do it. In a general way it can be figured that five dollars efficiently expended will save a Chinese life. To save China from partial annihilation is not only a humanitarian, but an economic, duty devolving upon the United States. China has the last great source of undeveloped raw materials, and she has the manpower to make them productive.

IF AMERICA takes up the duty laid upon it, we not only can save millions of human lives that are an economic factor in America's welfare, but we can prevent a recurrence of these famines at least in the section of China now affected. There are two ways in which this can be done: First, by the installation of a modern irrigation system, which has been surveyed and worked out by American engineers, but never constructed; and, second, by sinking throughout the provinces affected a series of wells. I have been informed by competent engineers who have investigated the problem that at a depth of about thirty feet below the surface of these plains, there exists a hardpan, upon which there flows a perpetual supply of water which drifts subterraneously from the Yellow River. These wells could be dug this winter. They ultimately would furnish a good market for American windmills.

I am not a believer in the bestowal of indiscriminate charity. It is perfectly feasible to make contributions from the United States productive. No Chinaman, outside of a professional mendicant, wants charity. He is more than willing to work for what is given him, and to render more than an honest day's work for less than an honest day's pay. Let each class be put upon a ration. Those who are too far gone from malnutrition, of course, cannot be expected to work, but for those who are still able-bodied let work be provided. In this way the relief funds can be made to accomplish the maximum result.

If this is done, the United States will have not only the satisfaction of having saved millions of people from starvation, but the resultant stimulation of commerce between China and the United States ultimately will return manyfold every dollar that is contributed to the cause.

MR. UNDERWOOD, who is a member of the editorial staff of the Washington Bureau of the Seattle Times, has just returned to the United States after spending four months in the Orient. He studied the famine situation at first hand and presents facts regarding its effects on America and on the problems of relief which previously have not been brought out in discussions of the crisis.

Jesus Teaches Forgiveness

International Sunday School Lesson for January 9

Matt. 18:21-35

By LUTHER DENNY WHITEMORE, Litt.D.

THE teaching of Jesus concerning forgiveness is exceedingly practical in its application, for there is no one who does not need forgiveness and no one who does not have occasion to forgive. The conventional expression, "Pardon me, please," which one hears and uses repeatedly, is a bit of evidence which shows how lasting has been the teaching of Jesus and how Christian standards of conduct have been accepted as established social usage. The words "pardon" and "forgive," although derived from different sources, conveyed originally the same idea, that of giving fully or completely, and they are thus used in the English Bible; as, in Isaiah 55:7, "He will abundantly pardon;" and in Psalm 103:3, "Who forgiveth all their iniquities."

Peter's question, "How often shall I forgive my brother?" suggests an actual occurrence in which Peter had been offended, rather than a calm discussion of moral obligation as an abstract theory. Evidently something had happened which gave an opportunity for a definite application of the Sermon on the Mount; and a situation had arisen which was to test the Golden Rule. Peter acknowledged the duty of forgiveness and generously professed his readiness to forgive seven times if necessary; but in his mind there was a question whether forgiveness might not sometime cease to be a virtue.

It has been said that occasions for repentance and for the exercise of forgiveness occur inevitably among intimate associates, where causes producing friction, misunderstanding, and annoyance are sometimes magnified until they reach serious proportions. From such sources come estrangements between members of the same family, differences between members of the same church, and the interruption of intimate friendships, perils which can be averted only by the possession of childlike humility and Christlike willingness to forgive.

THE group of the disciples was not exceptional in this respect, although it is remarkable that only one instance of contention among them has been recorded, their strife over the question who should be the greatest. Perhaps Peter had been an interested party in this dispute. His aggressive personality made him a natural leader. He was the first whom Jesus had called as a disciple, and in a peculiar way he had enjoyed the Master's confidence. He had been the first to acknowledge Jesus as the Christ, and for this he had been significantly commended. Therefore he might naturally have taken offense when his claim to the right of preeminence was opposed.

If such was the situation, nothing could have been more appropriate than Jesus' answer, "Not seven times, but seventy times seven," followed by the parable of the forgiving king and the unforgiving servant with its unmistakable application.

The duty of forgiveness is implied in the Christian program of love to God and love to man. One who loves his heavenly Father finds it easy to ask for forgiveness; and one who loves his neighbor finds it easy to forgive a grievance.

Forgiveness is distinctly a Christian virtue. The pagan world into which Christ was born was cruel and resentful. Its highest moral ideas were those of justice and retribution. It was a universal belief that justice invariably required penalty for sin, and that the purpose of the penalty was punishment and pain rather than reformation of the sinner. Hatred and revenge were thought admirable in the person wronged. Even the laws of Moses, the most humane which the world had ever known, required, or at least permitted, the practice of retaliation for personal injuries. How different from all this was the teaching of Jesus, who commanded His disciples not only to love and forgive one another, but to love and forgive their enemies also.

There is no real conflict between justice and forgiveness. One who commits an offense against an individual afterwards repents and asks for pardon, may reasonably expect to be forgiven; but one who commits a crime against society, although he is filled with remorse and expresses his deep regret, can not claim exemption from the penalty which his act merits. On the other hand, an individual who has suffered personally through a lawless act committed by another may personally forgive the offender, and at the same time he may, without hatred or malice, insist upon a just penalty for the offense in order that society may be protected; and society can not ignore crimes and misdemeanors, for the first duty of society is self-preservation; and organized society must protect its individual members. But even those who commit crimes against the social order may be capable of repentance, and if penitent may be forgiven. These, if sincerely penitent, will not desire so much the remission of the penalty as an opportunity to make amends for the wrong which they have done.

The fact that we ourselves have been forgiven is not the reason why we ought to forgive those who trespass against us, but rather a motive which should awaken within us a forgiving impulse, and a willingness to forgive; and the prayer, "Forgive us as we forgive," does not imply that we are entitled to forgiveness because we have forgiven. But if we with an unforgiving spirit pray for forgiveness, the evidence is strong against us and shows that we are not truly penitent.

ALTHOUGH the teaching of Jesus refers particularly to the relations between individuals, yet it may be asked whether a nation as such may forgive and be forgiven. It is not uncommon for a nation, without loss of self-respect, to disavow an act which has been interpreted as unfriendly and to express regret for the offensive acts of individual citizens. The offering and the accepting of such an apology between friendly nations is at least similar to repentance and forgiveness between persons.

Suppose that those who planned and initiated the Great War had, before defeat, become conscious of the awful sin which in God's sight had been committed; and suppose that sincere repentance had been experienced by the responsible rulers and leaders; and suppose, further, that all possible efforts had been made towards restitution as a repentant individual might have done;—under such circumstances how easy it would have been to restore relations of peace and friendship! And is there, after all, any substitute for the teachings of Jesus as a preventive and remedy for the moral ills that afflict nations as well as individuals?

Nothing brings disaster in the home, in the church, or in the family of nations more surely than the presence of an unrepentant or an unforgiving spirit; but peace and harmony and happiness will be everywhere assured by obedience to this law of love: "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

a. Ought the debtor in the parable to have forgiven his fellow servant even if he himself had not been forgiven?

b. What notable instances of human forgiveness are mentioned in the Old Testament?

c. Why is the spirit of forgiveness so essential in the Christian life?

One day many years ago Archer G. Jones—founder of the Duplex Envelope Company—glanced at a telegram about to go out. The message ended "Answer Collect".

"You've left out something," Mr. Jones said. "When you telegraph be brief, of course, but don't forget that whatever else you economize on, we can always afford to say 'please'."

Just taking pains to use that particular word is a trifle. But it indicates what Mr. Jones' aim has been—to develop in the whole organization the mental attitude that makes it come natural to say and do the courteous thing.

Today the Duplex people all feel a personal pride in the cordial relations that have grown up between the Company and the many thousand of progressive churches whose envelopes it supplies year after year.

smile; the Young Doctor, coming in brusquely from his round of calls, was aware of her pink cheeks and her sparkling eyes. All at once he realized that Rose-Marie was a distinct addition to the humdrum life of the place; that she was like a sweet old-fashioned garden set down in the gardenless slums. He started to say something of the sort before he remembered that a quarrel lay, starkly, between them.

Rose-Marie, herself, could scarcely have told why she was so bubbling over with gladness. When she left the tenement home of the Volskys she had been exceedingly depressed, and when she parted from Bennie at the Settlement House steps she had been ready to cry. But the hours between that parting and dinner-time had brought her a sort of assurance, a sort of joyous bravery. She felt, at last, that she had found her true vocation, her real place in the sun. The Volsky family presented to her a very genuine challenge.

She glanced covertly at the Young Doctor. He was eating soup, and no man is at his best while eating soup. And yet, as she watched him, she considered very seriously whether she should tell him of her adventure. His skill might, perhaps, find some way out for Lily—who had not been born a mute, who had come into the world with seeing eyes. Bennie had told her that it was the result of an illness—the child's condition. Perhaps the Young Doctor might be able to effect at least a partial cure. Perhaps it was selfish of her, utterly, absurdly selfish, to keep the situation to herself.

THE Superintendent's voice broke sharply into her reverie. It was a pleasant voice, and yet Rose-Marie found herself resenting the questioning tone of it.

"Did you have a pleasant afternoon, dear," the Superintendent was asking. "I noticed that you were out for a long while, alone!"

"Why, yes," Rose-Marie faltered, as she spoke, and—to her annoyance—she could feel the red wave of a blush creeping up over her face (Rose-Marie had never learned to control her blushes). "Why, yes, I had a very delightful afternoon!"

The Young Doctor, glancing up from his soup, felt a sudden desire to tease. Rose-Marie, with her cheeks all flushed, made a startlingly colorful, extremely young picture.

"You're blushing!" he told her accusingly. "You're blushing!"

Rose-Marie, feeling the blushes creep still higher, knew a rude impulse to slap the Young Doctor. All of her desire to confide in him died away as suddenly as it had been born. He was the man who had said that the people who live in poverty are soulless. He would scoff at the Volskys, and at her desire to help them. Worse than that—he might keep her from seeing the Volskys again. And in keeping her from seeing them, he would also keep her from making Bennie into a real, wholesome boy; he would keep her from showing Ella the dangers of the precipice that she was skirting. Of course, he might help Lily. But Rose-Marie told herself that perhaps even Lily—golden-haired, angelic little Lily—might seem soulless to him.

"I'm not blushing, Dr. Blanchard," she said shortly, and could have bitten off her tongue for saying it.

THE Young Doctor laughed with a boyish vigor.

"I thought," he said annoyingly, "that you were a Christian, Miss Rose-Marie Thompson!"

Rose-Marie felt a tide of genuine anger rising in her heart.

"I am a Christian!" she retorted.

"Then," the Young Doctor was still laughing, "then you must never, never tell untruths. You are blushing!"

The Superintendent interrupted. It had been her rôle, lately, to interrupt quarrels between the two who sat on either side of her table.

"Don't tease, Billy Blanchard!" she said, sternly. "If Rose-Marie went anywhere this afternoon, she certainly had a right to. And she also has a right to blush. I'm glad, in these sophisticated days, to see a girl who can blush!"

The Young Doctor was leaning back in his chair, surveying the pair of them with unconcealed amusement.

"How you women do stick together!" he said. "Talk about men being clamorous! I believe," he chuckled, "from the way Miss Thompson is blushing, that she's got a very best beau! I believe that she was out with him this afternoon!"

Rose-Marie, who had always been taught that deceit is wicked, felt a sudden unexplainable urge to be wicked! She told herself that she hated Dr. Blanchard—she told herself that he was the most unsympathetic of men. His eyes, fixed mirthfully upon her, brought words—that she scarcely meant to say—to her lips.

"Well," she said slowly and distinctly, "what if I was?"

What Doctors do for their own sore throats

"I want to congratulate you, Doctor, on the great success I hear you are having with your throat cases. I myself have attacks of inflamed throat every winter, can't seem to get rid of them. Wish you would take a look at mine and tell me what to do."

"I guess, Doctor, I will have to introduce you to Formamint. Here's a real good throat antiseptic with which you will keep the soft tissues in an almost constant antiseptic bath, because you will find Formamint pleasant and convenient enough to use frequently. I find that the average patient will readily dissolve a Formamint tablet in his mouth every hour or so, and you know how hard it is to get them to use gargles or sprays consistently, even two or three times a day, especially children."

"Formamint tablets certainly relieve sore throats and are heading off a lot of tonsillitis for me, but I am even more interested in their prophylactic power, and so I am advising my patients to use them freely during the throat and influenza season to prevent infection."

Any druggist will tell you how widely Formamint is recommended by throat specialists, physicians and dentists.

of grace. If the individual Christian were ready, vast missions would scarcely be required. If individuals were more busy with their lines we should have less need of the net.

This is surely the ideal of the Christian Church—every man and woman a missionary, a herald of the good news of redeeming love. "As much as in me is!" Just so much as that and no more. I am not required to be a Moody or a Drummond, or any man with conspicuously outstanding gift. "Just as much as in me is," just so far I am to be ready. There are vast multitudes of isolated people who would be won by the line, but who will never be caught in the net.

I sometimes think I never should have been brought home by the ministry of a great and organized mission. That is no disparagement of missions; it only indicates that there are varieties of temperament, and we must apportion our methods to reach them all. There are souls that are exquisitely shy and reserved; the glaring publicity of the public mission might overawe them, while the tender dealing of the individual might constrain them to the Lord's feet.

We want an army of individuals "ready" for this form of service. Are we ready, "ready to be offered"? God is ready, and when we are ready to tell the good news, ready for individual service, we shall enter into "the joy of the Lord." "They that were ready went in with him to the feast," and so long as they remained in the spirit of readiness, at the feast they remained.

A Brazilian Sunday School

A STEAM laundry is used as the meeting place for a Sunday school in Bahia Blanca, Brazil. And the place seems appropriate enough, says Rev. George P. Howard, representative of the World's Sunday School Association in South America. Most of the children look as if they needed a laundry, and when they come in through the door labelled "Soiled Linen," that seems to be the proper designation for them.

But the laundry Sunday school is the beginning of cleanliness, if the example of another school in the same city is any indication. Five years ago there came together a crowd of children whom the missionary described as "the filthiest I have ever seen." But the Sunday school spirit got hold of them, and they have continued to meet until just a few days ago the local bank advanced a loan of $6,000 so that this same lot of children, grown up now, might buy one of the finest properties in the neighborhood for a permanent church and Sunday school.

THE HOME

MARIE LYNDALL DARRACH

Adventures of the Food Family—Chocolate

STORMS had been raging about the Lighthouse home of the Gilson family, and one night when the waves were running particularly high, Mother promised the children some steaming hot chocolate before they went to bed, and suggested that its travels and ancestry might be inquired into.

"The chocolate 'bean' is not a bean at all," said Father introducing the story, "but the kernel of the fruit of the cacao tree of Central America and other tropical countries. The cacao tree is an evergreen, and grows three or four times as high as a man. It has fruit shaped like a thick short cucumber. The skin is rough and warty and the inside is a sweet pinkish white pulp. It is used for food, and contains from twenty to sixty seeds as large as almonds. These seeds, which are called chocolate beans, have a thin brittle, reddish brown husk and a dark oily inside.

"After the beans are roasted they are crushed and cleared of the husks. These husks are cocoa shells, and the beans broken into pieces are called cocoa nibs. The paste which is made by grinding the nibs alone is called cocoa, and that made by grinding them with other substances and flavors is called chocolate.

"Chocolate is a food as well as a flavor," said Mother, "as it is nearly half fat, as well as containing about twelve per cent. of protein and twenty eight per cent. of starch. It is mostly made with milk or cream, and furnishes an unusually hearty beverage that is almost a meal in itself.

"Cocoa and chocolate are so closely related," Father went on, "that I imagine even in their own family it is difficult to tell them apart. They are like twins who look so much alike that people are always making mistakes about them. The only difference between a cocoa and a chocolate is that in making the cocoa about half of the fat is taken out, so that the finished product is much less rich and is more easily digested. This makes it preferable for use as a steady beverage, or for the use of children or invalids, who have difficulty in digesting fats."

"It is very much more economical," resumed Mother, "to use cocoa in a great many recipes which call for chocolate as a flavoring, since all the best cocoas carry the chocolate flavor perfectly."

"Cocoa isn't even a poor relation of chocolate, then," interrupted Sara, "since it is quite as important as a food product and the only reason that seems to make chocolate a bit more stylish is that it is used more often for flavoring cake and ice-cream and candy."

"And even then," said Mother, "it is many times getting credit where no credit is due, because when the quality of the bean is good and care is taken in roasting, cocoa is equally good as a flavoring for even these sweets, and is nearly always used where candy and ice-cream are made in large quantities."

"The family had a very wonderful name at first," concluded Sara. "The Incas in Peru called it 'Theombrá,' which means the 'food of the gods,' and shows that in very early times it was as much appreciated as it is in these days."

A Batch of Lighthouse Recipes

FROZEN CHOCOLATE

SCALD two cupfuls of rich milk. Melt one and a quarter squares of unsweetened chocolate in three quarters of a cupful of boiling water; boil for two minutes and add to the milk with three quarters of a cupful of sugar and a tiny pinch of ground cinnamon. Stir over hot water and cook for three minutes longer, then remove from the fire and beat with an egg-beater. When cold flavor with half a teaspoonful of vanilla extract and add four tablespoonfuls of whipped cream. Then freeze and serve with sweetened whipped cream and grated coconut.

SHRIMP AND CABBAGE SALAD

To the ordinary shrimp salad, add one-third of its bulk of finely shredded cabbage. One can of shrimps thus treated will not only be improved in flavor but will go a great deal further than when served in the usual fashion.

PEANUT BUTTER SOUFFLÉ

Two-thirds of a cupful of peanut butter, one cupful of tomato juice, half a teaspoonful of onion juice, one cupful of soft stale bread-crumbs, one teaspoonful of salt, and three eggs. Mix the first five ingredients, add the well-beaten yolks of the eggs and fold in the stiffly beaten whites. Pour the mixture into a buttered baking dish and cook in a moderate oven for about twenty minutes. If desired, a little water and lemon juice may be used instead of the tomato. Serve the soufflé with tomato sauce made as follows:—Two tablespoonfuls of butter or substitute, two tablespoonfuls of flour, half a teaspoonful of salt and one cupful of tomato juice. Melt the butter, add the flour and cook for about a minute. Add the tomato juice and salt and stir the sauce until it thickens. Either skim-milk or water flavored with tomato catsup may be used instead of the tomato juice in making this sauce.

APPLES WITH SAUSAGE FILLING

Baked apples with sausage filling are prepared by coring and peeling large apples and filling the cavity from which the core has been taken with a quarter of a pound of sausage meat. Place in a baking pan, pour in one cupful of water, mixed with two tablespoonfuls of sugar and a few drops of lemon juice. Cover the pan and bake until the apples are tender. Baste two or three times while cooking, and uncover for the last ten minutes to brown.

OX TAIL SOUP

One cupful of ox tail cut into small pieces, one-fourth teaspoonful of white pepper, one tablespoonful of parsley or celery top, one-half cupful of finely cut carrots, one cupful of diced potatoes, one-fourth cupful of barley, one-half cupful of onions, cut fine, and one tablespoonful of salt. The ox tail should be chopped at each joint, making pieces from one to two inches long. Wash well in two or three waters. Put on to boil with two quarts of cold water, add the barley, and boil slowly for two hours, then add onions, carrots, salt and pepper and boil for thirty minutes. Add ten small potatoes and boil for twenty-five minutes and add a little paprika and parsley. This makes a very nutritious soup.

PICKLED PIGS FEET

Wash and clean the feet thoroughly, cover with cold water slightly salted and boil with a few celery tops and a sliced onion until the meat is very tender. Take out, drain and pack in sterilized jars, covering them while you make ready for the pickle. For four feet allow one quart of vinegar, one quarter of a cupful of sugar, eighteen whole black peppers, six blades of mace, and six whole cloves. Boil this for five minutes and pour boiling hot over the meat. It will be ready for use in two days, and provided the spiced vinegar covers the meat it will keep in a cool, dry place for six weeks without losing its flavor.

SALT PORK AND CREAM GRAVY

For the crisp salt pork in cream gravy, cut a half pound of lean salt pork into dice and fry crisp and brown. Drain and place on brown paper. Make one and one-half cupfuls of cream sauce, using part of the pork fat in the pan, and season with a tiny pinch of salt, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley and the same of minced canned pimientos. Re-heat to the boiling point, stir in quickly the hot pork dice and serve immediately. The pork should retain its crispness.

Utilizing Picture Post-Cards

NEARLY every household has an accumulation of picture post-cards because there is a disinclination to destroy them after they are received and read. Many times the desire to do something with them presents itself, but few plans for disposing of them are suggested. This is one which is practical.

Take two cards and paste them together so that the writing is hidden and the two picture surfaces are exposed. When a good-sized boxful has been collected, mail them to the nearest hospital.

Children and even grown-ups who are recovering from illness get great pleasure in looking at them and talking about them.

The hospital authorities are always glad to receive them because they can be sterilized very easily; whereas so many things which are sent to them have to be destroyed for fear of infection. The preparation of these cards will occupy the children of the household when they have nothing to do on rainy afternoons.

A Cleaning Outfit

THE way of the housekeeper is hard or easy according to her choice and use of methods. Expert use of good cleaning tools will do wonders toward making her way easy. The house that has only a few old-fashioned tools for cleaning purposes cannot be very well kept, except by heart-breaking labor.

The supply of soaps and powders and other needed cleaning agents should never be allowed to remain depleted, but should always be on hand for instant use. The immediate results of effective cleaning more than make up for whatever may be unpleasant in the process. Women who express loathing for dishwashing are very likely to be ones who employ poor methods and slight skill in performing this task.

So many inexpensive mechanical appliances are now available for making the work of the housewife lighter and more effective, that it is false economy to fail to provide the household with this means of making life easier and more comfortable.

The Gilsons' Mail-Bag

DEAR Lady of the Lighthouse:

As I have been trying some of your recipes and enjoying them, I will send you two which you and others may like to try.

The first I call "Very Best" Cream Chicken, and it is made by preparing a young chicken as you would for broiling. Then take one cupful of flour and mix into it one tablespoonful of salt and one-half teaspoonful of pepper. Roll each piece of chicken in the flour and lay in a buttered baking pan. Pour over it one and one-half pints of milk and one-half pint of cream. If the chicken is not very fat add a few pieces of butter here and there and bake in a moderate oven until it becomes thoroughly tender.

The second is a Pineapple Whip which is made by draining the juice from a quart can of pineapple; then beat two eggs, add three tablespoonfuls of sugar and two tablespoonfuls of corn-starch. Mix well and stir into the juice which has been heated. Put it in a double boiler and cook until thick. Dice the pineapple and stir into it before it is quite cold. Just before serving add one quarter of a pound of diced marshmallows and one cupful of chopped walnuts. Then cover with one pint of cream whipped stiff.

A SMALL quantity of carbolic acid added to paste or mucilage will prevent mold. An ounce of the acid to a gallon of whitewash will help to keep cellars and dairies free from the disagreeable-odor which taints milk and meat if kept in such places.

If you fear moths in your carpets, you can often kill them by placing a wet towel on the edges and pressing with a hot flatiron. The safest way is to take the carpet up and clean thoroughly, wash the floor and put benzine in the cracks and sprinkle red pepper on the floor, before relaying the carpet. This will destroy any moths or eggs. Do not forget that benzine is inflammable.

A good substitute for whipped cream is the white of an egg; one apple (or if small two can be used) and one cupful of sugar. Beat until very stiff, and use in all places where whipped cream is desired.

In mixing a fruit salad remember that bananas should be added the last moment before serving and the oranges should not be put into it a very long time before it is to be eaten.

The ancients did not understand the construction of the true arch as built today, but instead overlaid massive blocks of stone, the one cut to fit into the other. These archways above the many colonnades, with their enormous weight, slowly through the centuries forced the columns out at the top, while the erosion of the rain beating at the bottoms of the columns, loosened them at this point.

The French cleared away the growth from around the principal buildings. Those of the columns which had been pushed outward at the top were pulled back into place and held with iron rods. The tops of towers which were crumbling were shored up with steel and concrete. Steps which had been worn almost through by the feet of pilgrims were replaced. The bottoms of the columns in the galleries were strengthened with cement. Columns which had fallen were replaced. Dozens of the huge stone deities which had been thrown down and broken by invaders or the elements were cemented or bolted together and placed back in their old familiar niches. The six-armed statue previously mentioned is a good example of the fine repair work done. This was broken in six places and all its arms knocked off; yet so well was the repairing done that it is almost impossible to note where the breaks have been mended.

Countless wonders of ancient civilizations have vanished. Many things which might have been saved for the edification of future generations have been destroyed by unthinking, uncaring vandals, or through the neglect, thoughtlessness or penuriousness on the part of short-sighted governments. The reclamation of Angkor Thom and Watt is therefore worthy of high praise. It has gone on quietly, without sound of self-praising trumpets on the part of the French authorities, and so the world at large has heard little of it. Its continuation, slowly and thoroughly, will save for future generations these beautiful relics of a wonderfully advanced people who have forever passed.

The Most Helpful Passage in the World

E. L., C. E., and B. Y. P. U.

Psa. 119: 129-136

THE psalmist writes: "The entrance of thy words giveth light, it giveth understanding unto the simple." To decide, however, which is the most helpful passage in the Bible is a matter of individual circumstance. There is something in the Bible for everybody, and the thousands of passages contained in this most wonderful of all books may be applied to the varied temperaments and manifold needs of the human race. The meeting can be made one of profit and inspiration if, for instance, such a program as follows is adopted:

Let each member cite a passage that has been of especial help to him or her.

Assign work to some of the members, instructing them to bring to the meeting some famous texts of history, giving their historic background, and some of the great movements for which they were directly or indirectly responsible. For instance: "The just shall live by faith," which was Martin Luther's reformation text. (See Boreham, A Bunch of Everlastings, or Texts That Made History.)

Let others bring to the meeting the testimony of great men and women, endorsing and stressing the value of the Bible and its study, for instance: "All the distinctive features and superiority of our republican institutions are derived from the teachings of Scripture."—Edward Everett. "To my early knowledge of the Bible I owe the best part of my taste in literature."—John Ruskin. "The following are the chapters through which, thus learned she (my mother) established my soul in life: Exodus 15 and 20; 2 Samuel 1, from verse 17 to the end; 1 Kings 8; Psalms 23, 32, 90, 91, 103, 112, 119, and 139;

Proverbs 2, 3, 8, 12; Isaiah 58; Matthew 5 and 7; Acts 26; 1 Corinthians 13 and 15. I count these chapters very confidently the most precious, and on the whole the most essential part of my education."—John Ruskin.

Bible reading brings God nearer to us. Bible reading introduces us to the best literature. Bible reading is like looking into a mirror. Bible reading will bring us noble companionship and it ennobles life. The poets and prose writers depend on the Bible for the beauty of its figurative language, and its perfect style. Emerson said, "Shakespeare leans on the Bible." Famous men and women in the realm of creative thought and action, lean on the Bible. As Cowper said:—

"A glory gilds the sacred page,
Majestic like the sun;
It gives a light to every age."

What has the Bible meant in your life? What can the Bible mean to this age? To take the Bible out of thought and action would be like sending a ship to sea without chart or compass. Read the Bible before you read any other book. To begin with the world's best literature first, is reading backwards. To begin with the Bible, is opening all the doors to learning and achievement.

Many Big Incomes

THERE were 721 individuals and corporations in the Chicago districts which had an income of $1,000,000 or more in 1919, as shown by the federal income tax returns. This was an increase of thirty-one over the preceding year. The income tax due from one corporation was said to be $24,000,000, while another corporation must pay $10,000,000.

Use RESINOL for a clear skin and good hair

Resinol Soap used regularly for the shampoo tends to keep the hair lustrous and the scalp free from dandruff. Where there is already a serious accumulation of dandruff, part the hair and rub Resinol Ointment well into the scalp some time before shampooing. At all druggists.

Huge Shrinkage in Crop Values

FINAL estimates by the Department of Agriculture placed the total worth of this year's farm crops at almost $5,000,000,000 less than for last year, although the harvest was one of the most bountiful in the nation's history, and half a dozen important crops set new records. The important crops, which comprise about 90 per cent. of the value, were appraised this year by the federal experts at $9,148,419,000, as against $14,087,995,000 last year.

The shrinkage in values was perhaps most striking in the case of the corn yield, which is worth $1,662,000,000 less than for 1919 although it was 374,000,000 bushels greater than that crop. The yield per acre for corn set a new record with an average production of 30.9 bushels, the nearest approach to this being the 30.3 yield of 1906.

The final estimates showed increases over the preliminary figures in almost every instance. Corn made a gain of 33,000,000 bushels; winter wheat, 48,000,000 bushels; oats, 70,000,000 bushels; and potatoes, 9,000,000 bushels. Spring wheat was listed at a decrease of 9,000,000 bushels. The acreage devoted to the principal crops for 1920 was smaller than for the preceding year, the total being 351,062,409 as compared with 356,162,122.

The final federal estimates on some of the principal crops were as follows:

Crop	Quantity	Value
Corn (bu.)	3,232,367,000	$2,189,721,000
Winter wheat (bu.)	580,513,000	866,741,000

UNEMPLOYMENT WORRIES BRITAIN. The growth of unemployment in Great Britain has caused a serious problem and the government was being pressed to find a solution. Official statistics showed 500,000 to be idle but these figures were acknowledged to be incomplete and labor leaders estimated the number at more than 1,000,000. Several municipalities have begun improvement works to afford aid.

REDS MENACE CZECHOSLOVAK GOVERNMENT. Communist forces have been attempting to overthrow the government of Czechoslovakia, and the situation was serious enough to cause worry over the outcome. Much of the country was under martial law and Prague was strongly held by troops. There were numerous casualties in the clashes between troops and the extremists.

the liquor is sold. These are slackers. They encourage lawlessness. The Supreme Court of the United States said that the Prohibition Amendment "binds all Legislative bodies, courts, public officers and individuals." Any citizen of this Republic who accepts the blessings of Government, and then refuses to do his part in helping to sustain that Government and enforce its laws, needs to take a course in patriotism and Americanization.

WHILE Prohibition is not a complete success in some portions of the country, yet, as a whole, it is succeeding as rapidly as we have any right to expect. The remedy is not to knock, but boost. The law must be sustained and strengthened. It will never be repealed. This requires organized activity on the part of the anti-liquor forces. The Anti-Saloon League is backing a great campaign for Law and Order. It is essential to the perpetuity of the Government. When respect for law and its enforcement is gone, all is gone in orderly government. Civic, temperance, and church bodies are challenged by this menace of lawlessness. Derelict officers must be aroused to action, or an attempt must be made to remove them. Recently the Federal Council of Churches at Boston urged Congress to enact a law to remove derelict officials. Every citizen must be made to realize that if he does not stand for law enforcement, he is neither a good sportsman nor a good citizen. In private business, on committees, and at elections we accept the will of the majority. This is the American way. No man can be a good citizen who does not support the Government of the United States. We need to learn anew the meaning of the American creed. Its closing paragraph should be as familiar to American citizens as the Ten Commandments. This is what it says:

"I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag and to defend it against all enemies."

The enemies of our country are those who violate its laws. When laws in a democracy are enacted by the orderly processes of Government they are binding in every citizen until repealed by the same process.

Officers and citizens who wink at the violation of these laws must be made to realize that they are playing with fire. Lawlessness by rum-runners begets lawlessness along all lines. If liquor dealers in New York or elsewhere are given protection in their lawlessness, bomb-throwers take courage and claim the same right to defy the law. There is a big job ahead for the friends of Prohibition. They have won about two-thirds of the fight, and they are not discouraged but determined. There will be no let-up until the victory is complete.

The Greatest Book of the Year

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY

Being a Plain History of Life and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Mr. Ernest Barker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Professor Gilbert Murray

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY is unique in the modern literature of the world.

Mr. Wells has taken all history for his province. He presents it as one vast panorama, not of "reigns and pedigrees and campaigns," of ordinary history, but of "ages and races and nations," brought within the "normal limitations of time and energy set to the reading and energy of an ordinary citizen." Beginning with primal star-dust, through the making of the planet and the birth of amoeba and reptile and mammal, through the slow evolution of man, through the dawn of early light of recorded history, Sumerian, Assyrian, Mongolian, Egyptian, Greek, Hebrew, Roman, Teutonic, down to the Great War and the present, runs the tremendous record.

Specialists vouch for Mr. Wells's facts. But the facts have passed through a single mind, and are interpreted by the author in his own way. He sees emerging out of human history an ideal of human unity and brotherhood. It is as entertaining and stimulating a book as Mr. Wells has ever written—a history as fascinating as a romance.

Particularly notable are the illustrations, including drawings in line, time charts, maps and diagrams, made under Mr. Wells's own supervision.

Questions and Answers

INQUIRER. Natural Bridge, Va. Throughout the Pauline epistles, there are scattered occasional passages of advice which were evidently called out by the tendencies of the times in which the epistles were written. In some instances, the apostle frankly stated of certain passages that they were not by inspiration but of his own suggestion. In the passages in 1 Tim. 2:8-15 and also in certain passages in Corinthians and Philippians, he discussed the duties of both men and women according as they were defined in the early Church, and gave certain advice in that connection which may not have been wholly of inspiration. These dealt with the right to teach, in connection with which he laid down the rule that, while women might teach, they should do so privately, among their own sex. Some commentators in connection with this have pointed out that even in those days, more especially in Corinth, there was a class of women seeking publicity of which he disapproved. The Church has broadened its platform since the times when Paul wrote; but even in his day, there were deaconesses (Rom. 16:1, 6, 12; Titus 2:3, 4, etc.) and godly women of marked ability who gave material help. Today, a liberal view is taken, and woman is finding a wide sphere for her energies in church work, and doing splendid service.

Troubled, Tate, Tenn. 1. The passage in Jer. 22:13 is believed to have been written as a condemnation of the course of King Jehoiakim, who not only taxed the people heavily, but took their forced labor without pay for building his palace, which was in violation of the Mosaic law in Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14, 15. 2. Deut. 24:10, a rule of generosity is laid down as between Israelites. The rich man, when he made a loan to his poorer brother, should not enter the latter's dwelling and take away anything as security. If the borrower should bring out of his house some pledge, the lender should hand it back to him before sundown, especially if the borrower be poor. 3. Ex. 35:3 does not mean that the Sabbath was to be a fast day—foodless—but that the Israelites should spare all absolutely unnecessary labor and cook the Sabbath meal on the previous day. While in the wilderness, the Israelites received a double supply of manna on the sixth day, doing away with the need of culinary labor on the Sabbath. The prohibition, of course, applied not only to fire for cooking purposes, but for working in metals or other purposes of trade.

Mrs. E. E. T., Tecumseh, Okla., makes this request: "Please tell me where the disciples were on the day of Pentecost. I thought it was in the upper room. I find it is denied, because the upper room was where they lived, and on the Day of Pentecost women were with them."

Leading Bible commentators agree that the "upper room" mentioned in Acts 1:13 was probably identical with the "large upper room" mentioned in Luke 22:12, which the Master himself had chosen as the scene of the institution of the Lord's Supper. Some have suggested that the place of gathering at Pentecost may have been one of the temple courts; but the majority of Bible students hold that apostolic tradition points to the "upper room" already mentioned.

F. A. H., Lewisville, Tex. The 28th chapter of Ezekiel is a prophetic dirge on the reigning prince of Tyre, who was Ithobal or Ithbaal II. His name implies his connection with Baal the Phœnician deity. In the first twenty verses, the prophet applies similar language to that employed by Isaiah in rebuking the King of Babylon (see Isa. 14:13, 14). Ezekiel holds up the King of Tyre as the culmination and embodiment of the spirit of carnal pride and self-sufficiency, which characterized the whole state. Tyre stood upon a "holy island," sacred to Hercules, and the colonies looked up to her as the mother-city of their religion and of their political system. Ezekiel ironically alludes to the wisdom of Ithbaal, who believed himself to be wiser even than Daniel, the fame of whose knowledge had reached Tyre. Ithbaal's heart was swollen with his riches. Now his arrogance would be punished; the foreign invaders (the Chaldeans) would make a mock of his wisdom, lower his fame and take away his possessions. Where, then, will be his greatness, his wealth, his overshadowing wisdom, when he is face to face with death, and pierced through with many wounds? Will he still say with blasphemous boastfulness, that he is a god? It would appear, from the prophet's utterances in verses 13 to 20 that in the person of the Tyrian monarch, a new trial had been made of humanity, but that all the good gifts and endowments which the Lord had given him to use for great and noble purposes had been abused. Hence his guilt and shame were the greater.

E. B. McB., Sewickley, Pa. The "unpardonable sin" has been a matter of much discussion among theologians. Leading authorities are generally agreed that it was attributing the miracles of Jesus to satanic agency. We quite agree with your remark that there are preachers today who are unqualified to deal with such subjects.

T. S., Cincinnati, O. The Pilgrims may not all have been educated men and women, but they knew the Scriptures, and were trained in Christian duties as they understood them. All the records show that they were God-fearing men and women, to whom the free exercises of their religion was the most precious thing on earth.

M. R. A., writes in hearty disapproval of the startling fashions of today and of church members fellowshiping with the devotees of worldly amusements. We are receiving many letters on the same subject, some of the writers suggesting that it is a matter in which the pulpit could do acceptable service in the direction of reform.

R. E. B., North Dakota. It would seem that no reasonable objection can be raised against the fee for a Ladies' Aid Society luncheon, especially if it be simply sufficient to cover the cost. It helps to make agreeable social relations and consequently is beneficial to the work. Besides, it is far better to share the trifling expense than to put the burden on the church or upon one or two individual members of the Society. If the money can be devoted to church work, so much the better.

Dr. Joseph Pestal, Lamar, Colo., writes commenting on a recent editorial in the Christian Herald, in which attention was called to the article of a correspondent as giving what was probably "the first authentic account of Lenine and his surroundings, his personal appearance and his administrative methods." Dr. Pestal asks: "Do you not know that Raymond Robins gave us some interesting information along that line in the Metropolitan over a year ago? And how about Isaac McBride in the Asia Magazine for May 1, and W. T. Goode gives an interview with Lenine in the November, 1919, number of the Living Age, and there are Bertrand Russell's articles in the Nation. All these had interviews with Lenine and their testimony does not in any event coincide with that of the man whom you choose to quote. And here is a quotation from a recent number of the London Daily Mirror, from H. G. Wells: 'I have had a talk with Lenine and with various other people, and I have gone about very freely without a guide everywhere through Petrograd, Moscow and other places, seeing and judging for myself. We have been rather amused to read of disturbances and insurrections. All that is just humbug.'"

We are quite aware that the articles he mentions have appeared, as he states. They give one aspect of the personality of Lenine and Captain McCullagh, who had probably better opportunities than any of these correspondents, gives another. The general reader can choose between them. In a recent address by Lenine, extracts from which were cabled to the United States, Lenine admitted that his diplomacy was designed to make trouble between nations now at peace, which was more in line with Captain McCullagh's characterization of him than with that of the correspondents named. It has recently come to light that Lenine's government has some 25,000 Moscow-paid propagandists now at work spreading Bolsheviki doctrine, of fomenting strikes and political unrest throughout the world. Many of these are promoting trouble in the U. S. and South America. These propaganda disclosures have been cabled from The Hague by a leading news organization.

DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled 'Heart Stories,' which is now ready for publication, shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases as an agent in human affairs. In these seven stories, which the book contains, and six of which have never been published until now, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes that have been treated in short-story form—a form of which Dr. Sheldon is a master.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the 'Good Fight,' who became a benefactor to his fellow-men after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold, in

'As Heaven Views It,' whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in 'Why the Minister Remained'; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirringly told in 'Of Such Is the Kingdom' and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; 'Sunrise on the Mesa' is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; 'His Christmas Gift' is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal-mine story entitled 'Guests of Honor,' in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself. The whole, delightfully and romantically told, is well adapted to reading in the family group when its members meet by the cozy fire on winter evenings. All admirers of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book, 'In His Steps,' should read this new book.

Margaret Sangster says:

"When the name of Doctor Charles M. Sheldon, editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald, is printed on the cover of a book, the reader is assured of good, solid literary ability, of a sunny sense of humor, and of more than a bit of inspiration. The name of Charles M. Sheldon is associated, throughout the country, with the things that make life worth while—with ideals, and truth, and dreams of home, and the kind of religion that folk really live. The Christian Herald, in announcing the publication of Doctor Sheldon's newest book, feels that it is giving a splendid treat to the people who love good worth-while fiction.

'Heart Stories' is a collection of seven interesting tales, six of which never have been published before and all now published for the first time in book form. There are stories of college and of affairs of state; of the trials of a young minister and of the struggles of business men. There are stories in which youth fights the good fight, there are stories of near failure, and there are stories of love. And all of them are written in Doctor Sheldon's inimitable style and with the thread of his wholesome philosophy running through them.

No one, reading the first of the stories 'The Good Fight,' will want to lay aside the volume until the last story 'Guests of Honor' has been completed. And then, many readers will begin at the beginning and read over again every thrilling narrative. All of the seven stories will prove profitable reading."

TWO SPLENDID BOOKS FOR ALL HOMES

MARY-MARIE

MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER'S
LAST BOOK

The famous author of "Pollyanna," "Dawn," "The Road to Understanding," "Just David," etc. The first edition for the book trade is 100,000 copies

"Father calls me Mary. Mother calls me Marie. Everybody else calls me Mary-Marie. The rest of my name is Anderson. I'm thirteen years old, and I'm crosscurrent and a contradiction."

But Mary-Marie, the heroine of Mrs. Porter's new novel, is more than "crosscurrent and a contradiction"; she is the most intensely alive and adorable girl that has brightened American literature for many years. The daughter of an austere father who wanted to name his daughter Mary and of a young and somewhat flighty mother who preferred Marie, her double name exactly expresses the nature that the girl has inherited; a delightful blend of demure goodness and lively charm, of a sense of duty and love of mischief, that make her the most appealing of the many famous child characters Mrs. Porter has created.

Thirteen years ago Eleanor H. Porter began to write her beautiful stories of the "Glad Life" for the Christian Herald. Her work became popular with our readers almost immediately. She visited Mont-Lawn and studied child character under its spreading maples and pines, and there she found the material for much of the delightful literary work that came from her busy pen. Our readers will recall "Margaret," "Marco," "Still Waters" and other charming stories, followed later by the widely famous "Pollyanna," which also had its first presentation in the Christian Herald.

"Mary-Marie," her last work, is one of the finest stories she ever wrote. One can not help feeling that Mrs. Porter's book characters are living people. One can not help feeling that they were more than just "make believe." The blind hero of "Dawn" was a breathing human being; the little boy in "Just David" was appealingly true to life. The fact that she could create personalities with her pen is the real test of her greatness—rather than the fact that her books sell into the hundreds of thousands.

Eleanor H. Porter was a woman with a mission. Her mission was to reach as many hearts as possible and make them glad. She will assuredly touch your heart and the hearts of all who read "Mary-Marie."

If people thought more about cleanliness and less about disease

. . . there would be far less disease.

Neglect of the simple rules of mouth cleanliness causes tooth troubles which only the dentist can safely attempt to treat.

You can avoid many such difficulties if you keep your mouth clean by twice-a-day brushing with Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream.

This you can do with perfect safety.

For Colgate's does nothing but cleanse. It does not scour and it does not set up harmful chemical reactions in the mouth.

If, when you have faithfully kept your mouth and teeth clean, you find trouble, go to your dentist. He is the one to tell you why that condition persists and how to remedy it.

If the use of Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream is begun in youth and kept up, a great proportion of mouth and tooth troubles will never make their appearance. It is far better and safer to think about cleanliness, and let your physician or dentist do the thinking about disease.

Mastroianni, like the divine Boy who was "brought up" in Nazareth, was the son of a carpenter. His genius became evident in his early years, and he was sent to Rome, where he studied statuary and the methods of the great sculptors. Later he studied in Berlin and Vienna. By and by the apt pupil, who seemed to absorb all he saw, began to model in wax. He modeled portraits and became famous; but his heart longed to reproduce in plastic form the humanity of Jesus and his surroundings in the Holy Land. Soon the whole world began to be aware that a great artist had arisen—one worthy to be named with the most famous the world had yet known. Mastroianni's Bible sculptures have been accepted everywhere as masterpieces, especially those that relate to the life of Christ. He discloses a new and beautiful conception of the Saviour and His surroundings.

These wonderful Illustrations are put up in a folding wrapper, loose, so that each picture can be taken out and either framed singly or in groups, or they may be pasted into the owner's Bible at home.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Bible House, New York

Behind the Office Door

IF that old Chinese philosopher whom I've heard you quote, and who invented the maxim that 'In this world we have plenty of acquaintances, but very few real friends,' were to see the mail we are getting these days, he would pull out his pig-tail with amazement," said the Publisher, as he came into the sanctum the other day.

"What's the mail got to do with the maxim?" we interrogated. "Anyhow, you know that in China they do things upside down. They begin to build their houses at the top story, and they no doubt take an inverted view of social questions too. Besides, we're not printing a paper in China."

"True," said the Publisher, edging a little further into the room, "though we're getting thousands of dollars every day for that Chinese famine. But that isn't the point. A little while ago, you asked our folks to speak out their minds about the paper, and they are just filling the mails with their suggestions—all kinds—and still rolling in on us."

"Well," we responded, "what of it? These folks know the Christian Herald better than we do ourselves—some of them—and we needed a little good cheer at this season, to oil the machinery and make things sweet. I lift my hat to our great-hearted friends for their splendid co-operation!"

"They certainly did help us in that stiff climb up the Peak of High Prices, didn't they?" was the Publisher's retort. "I don't know when I ever saw such a fine response as we have been getting these last few weeks. It sets a new record, even for the Christian Herald. Here, for nearly a month I've been looking over these letters—hundreds of them at a time—and nearly all express a desire to help us over the Peak. And they're doing it, too. Every letter is a stepping-stone to boost us along. They run all the way from a year's renewal to two, three and four years, and some even send enough to cover ten years. Lots of them send in new subscribers, too. That old Peak is sure getting nearer all the time, and they will negotiate it yet, and take us over in grand style. It's a pretty stiff climb though, even at that."

"What! With such a constituency behind us, I wouldn't mind climbing a Peak a week!" I vociferated courageously, in my best platform voice; but he had shut the door and was already off down the hallway.

BUT the Publisher was right. It has been a stiff climb. But now that we are nigh the top, I feel that the whole episode is just another uplifting illustration of the solidarity of our Family Circle. They go the limit every time, when the old paper is concerned. Not for all the perils of a dozen Peaks would I have missed the fine spirit of comradeship that has inspired them. I only wish, as I have often wished before, that I could shake hands with every one who has written to us on the subject.

It isn't easy to decide from which sex we receive the most encouragement in our mail, but some of the letters are so kindly and helpful, that we trust the writers will forgive us if we quote a few. Mrs. M. E. B., of Lape, Ark., writes: "You will never know how much the Christian Herald aids us in our lives. Some day we plan to have it sent to every family we know, who can't afford it themselves." Mrs. M. S. Parry, of the Department of Peace and Arbitration, W. C. T. U., Waynesburg, Pa., a talented and experienced observer, writes giving seven reasons why she likes the Christian Herald, and these are so cleverly set forth that I am sure other readers would like to scan them for the sake of comparison as to how minds agree, or the opposite.

Mrs. J. S. Rittenhouse of Lorane, Pa., another up-to-date reader, gives her impressions of the paper in these terms: "You certainly keep your readers posted on current events in a very condensed way, which I think is commendable. I like the Daily Meditations best of all, and very frequently it occurs that the very article I am reading is what I need, or fits for the particular need, as it were, the spiritual food prepared for this special day." Miss Esta Miller, of Shelbyville, Ind., is like-minded and says in her letter: "I believe the Daily Meditations really mean most to me, and I don't see how I could get along without them. But I depend upon the departments for giving me most of my news and reading material. I can always depend upon the point of view the Herald takes on vital matters, because it is always on the right side."

Mrs. S. M. Benjamin, Bridgeport, Conn., writes:

"I have belonged to the Christian Herald Family a number of years, and it would be like missing a good friend to be without it. It is all helpful and interesting. I enjoy the Daily Meditations very much, and Margaret Sangster's page." Mrs. T. J. Conkey, of Adrian, Mich., says: "I am glad to express an opinion on the Sunday Service page. It just speaks my mind. The only hope for the unsettled condition of Christianity is to get back to a more serious religion, if we want to bring souls into the Kingdom."

One of the finest letters comes from Mrs. Edward Leach, Vincennes, Ind., who writes: "I have been reading the Christian Herald for years. My father, a Baptist minister, received great help and inspiration from it. It has been an influence in our household. The wonderful sermons and the Daily Meditations are an especial service in inspiring help to us, and with the addition of the program for Family Worship, the devotional department is complete! I realize that the family altar is one of the greatest blessings in the home." And this presentation of the spiritual side of the paper is echoed by many friends, both new and old subscribers. Mrs. B. D. Mosher, Granville, N. Y., concludes a very cordial letter with these words: "I could not rest without telling you how much your paper means to me, and, I know, to very many others also."

AFEW of the letters, given below, are typical of hundreds of those we have received. Men and women alike have written with unusual frankness, on a subject which evidently lies close to their hearts. One can not read those letters and sit silent and unresponsive. While we muse, the fire burns within us, and our thoughts strive to find expression. And I think that if the spirit of the old magazine could find utterance, its rejoinder to these many letters of appreciation and confidence would be brief and to the point. This, I am sure, is substantially what it would say:

"I thank you from my heart of hearts for all the kind things you have written, in letters which would fill the paper several times over if all could be published. There is just one thing I would add, and it is this: To your prayers, your unwavering loyalty, your partnership in all good works, your zeal, not only to help suffering humanity, but to carry the Gospel to the ends of the earth, the Christian Herald owes its success. Without your hearty co-operation, it would have accomplished nothing. It was your gifts of bread and Gospels, and your prayers that made every godly enterprise on which we have entered in all those years so wondrously successful. I have seen you grow in numbers from a few thousands to hundreds of thousands, and I have witnessed your gifts for Christ and humanity rise from hundreds to millions of dollars. It was your union of heart and hand that laid the foundations of Gospel triumphs that are still progressing. Your work, accomplished through the Christian Herald, has brought a blessing to yourselves and your children and to all the world."

Among the letters from our women readers, this one from Miss A. Thatcher, Urbana, Ill., is particularly heartening:

"A Great Work for God"

"I will say for the Christian Herald that I think it has done a big work for God in the world. May it continue to hold up the banner of Christ to the saving of precious souls."

Mrs. Ida G. Nail, Mocksville, N. C., writes:

"Twelve or fifteen years ago, I chanced to see my first copy of the Christian Herald in an adjoining county, and it has come to my home regularly ever since. I prize it above all reading matter in the world, except my Bible."

Mrs. E. H. Lipe, Watertown, Ill., tells what she enjoys most in the magazine:

"I like the Christian Herald for the stand it takes for Truth and Right, for its broad-minded views and its helpfulness and encouragements to advance the best, on general and special subjects of interest; for the concise information it gives on these subjects and for the World's News and Current Events. I very much like the Editor's page; would like the names signed to the articles. The Sermons are fine and I enjoy them, and the Daily Meditations are comforting, and instructive and helpful for daily living. The Sunday-school lessons are good, and perhaps could be profitably enlarged upon. I have great faith in Sunday-school teaching; the young mind receives and needs it. I like Margaret E. Sangster's writings, and am glad she is to continue them. The B. Y. P. U. and Epworth League and Christian Endeavor articles are instructive and encouraging. The Prayer League is very essential. We know not how much that has accomplished and may yet accomplish. The Mail-Bag makes some fine explanations and solves some difficult questions. I like all the writings and stories that I have read by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, and his Benedictions in the Home Service; they are so comforting. I think the reduction to $2.00 in subscription will surely increase the usefulness and the number of subscribers to the Christian Herald. I have been a subscriber for 19 years and hope to be so as long as I live. I have sent quite a number of subscribers to the Herald, especially to make my Christmas presents of a year's subscription. I hope it will continue to increase in usefulness and be a power for good so long as the world stands."

Here are Mrs. Parry's seven reasons why she likes the Christian Herald:

"I like the Christian Herald.

(1) Because it is not only Christian in tone, but interdenominational in trend and character, thus giving us the best religious thought from the ablest leaders of all denominations.

(2) Because of its complete organization of many departments, each of which bears the hall-mark of an expert specialist.

(3) Its open forum as embodied in its Prayer League, Mail-Bag, Questions asked and answered.

(4) Its specific work for humanity, in always raising funds for the needy.

(5) For the contributions in prose and poetry of Margaret Sangster, the wonderfully gifted granddaughter of one of my earliest and dearest literary friends.

(6) The artistic beauty of its front pages, and all its fine illustrations, many of which adorn the walls of refined homes, not only as works of art, but as inspiration to a higher level of vision.

(7) Because of its continual advance in editorial management. The acquisition of Dr. Charles M. Sheldon is present proof of the Herald's high watermark."

AMONG the letters from men is one by Rev. H. W. Uffelin, of New York City, which gives a minister's preferences:

"The writer very greatly appreciates and enjoys the weekly visits of your paper. Personally I would like to see your editorial forum increased, and by all means continue the World News of the Week. One of the most delightful features among the many good things you have is the meditation by Dr. Jowett, and his monthly sermon. Please give us more of these! Quite a number of people have told me how much they enjoy Dr. Jowett's column in your great paper. After retaining and amplifying these features, make all the changes you want!

"God bless you in your great ministry through the press!"

J. J. Glenn, Madisonville, Ill., himself an editor of long experience, writes:

"With no aim at flattery, I will say that no one but the fellow with a grudge could well criticize the Christian Herald unfavorably. I have been in newspaper editorship for more than 30 years, have read all kinds of papers and do not hesitate to say the Herald comes nearer to measuring up to my standard of excellence than any other publication I ever knew."

"If the Herald could be read and its teachings followed in every home of the United States, we should have a nation that would be Christian in deed, as well as in name."

Hurley Romig, Beaver Springs, Pa., for thirty years a subscriber, says:

"I have been a subscriber, without a break, for thirty years, and my family and I always look forward to receiving it every week. In it are such good readings, that help so much and are a guide for the Christian as well as the sinner."

"Under your management, the Herald has grown brighter, and quite an improvement all along is noticed. I believe a great good is being done, in stories like those that appeared in recent issues, such as the three-part story, Christ, the politician and the people. We need more of such lessons in our national life, for it is so easy to drift to materialism, where all that we do should be done, as Christ would do them. My prayers are with the Herald. Have the good work go on and continue to grow in the work for the Master."

And from a new subscriber, C. E. Miller, of Spring Lake, Mich., comes this letter:

"I have been a subscriber of the Christian Herald but a few months, and I now realize what I have missed all these years when without it. What wonderful good I have received from those Home sermons, and Daily Meditations. I never read them without forming an earnest resolve to be a better citizen, a better neighbor, in fact a better Christian. Its value to me can not be measured in dollars and cents."

But, lest you weary, I'll stop here. That ugly Peak is getting lower and lower as we ascend. There are a few stiff acclivities still to be scaled, but we look forward to the day—not far off now, let us hope—when, with our feet firmly on the very summit, we can look back across the long trail, and join our friends in a hearty cheer that the big climb is ended.

What 1921 and Paramount Pictures have in store for you 1921 is going to be a banner year in the motion picture industry.

The extraordinary Paramount Pictures to be released will alone make it such.

All through the past year, and all over the world, the immense plans of Paramount have been in preparation for your 1921 entertainment.

1921 and Paramount will give you a flaming new idea, a totally new and magnificent conception of what the screen can mean to you!

Ideals plus immense organization—basis of Paramount supremacy

The basis of Paramount's supremacy will continue to be one of immense organization both in production and distribution of motion pictures, and unlimited resource of talent, money, physical equipment and imagination.

Paramount has enough studios and producing plants to equip forty ordinary motion picture companies. The chief of these studios are in California, New York, and London, England.

The whole world-wide producing organization of Paramount Pictures proceeds on a basis of assured success for the photoplays produced. That is, thousands of theatres in fifteen civilized countries are waiting eager to show them, and their audiences to see them.

Only Paramount organization can give Paramount quality

Neither time nor money, neither endless trouble nor terrible hazards of physical danger and difficulty, are spared to achieve striking results.

In some Paramount Pictures in 1921 you will see The Alps, for example, as mere items of the staging of a single scene. If the tropics are required, or the arctic zone, the tropics and the arctic zone you will get.

In other 1921 Paramount Pictures you will see whole groups of great stars in the same picture.

One instance of many: in the cast of one great picture, directed by Cecil B. DeMille, there are no fewer than eight stars: Wallace Reid, Gloria Swanson, Elliott Dexter, Wanda Hawley, Bebe Daniels, Agnes Ayres, Theodore Roberts and Theodore Kosloff. All this galaxy of talent in one Paramount Picture, and there will be 104 of them in 1921 for you!

1921 will carry on the great national success of Paramount as represented by the high water-mark it touched during the National Paramount Week in September, 1920, when more than six thousand American theatres showed nothing but Paramount

Pictures, and sixty-seven cents of every dollar that was paid to enter motion picture theatres was paid to enter those theatres which were foresighted enough to have Paramount.

Foresighted is right, because there was not a single print of any Paramount Picture, not a single, solitary reel, that was not working.

The people were out for Paramount then as they will be throughout 1921.

Greatest authors of Europe and America writing for Paramount Pictures

In addition to the most successful American directors, dramatists and novelists, who are naturally attracted by the sheer artistic supremacy afforded their work by the Paramount equipment, it is now history that the greatest dramatists of Europe, men of immortal fame, are working and devising subtle new plots for Paramount. Some of them have already arrived over three thousand miles of ocean to collaborate more closely with the Paramount producing organization for your delight.

Paramount is the name which has enrolled Sir James M. Barrie, Henry Arthur Jones, Edward Knoblock, Sir Gilbert Parker, Avery Hopwood, Elinor Glyn, Sir Arthur Wing Pinero, Joseph Conrad, Cosmo Hamilton, Arnold Bennett.

Paramount is the name of the organization which affords the greatest scope for the greatest directors, men of the stamp of Cecil B. DeMille, William DeMille, George Fitzmaurice, George Melford, William D. Taylor, Hugh Ford and Charles Maigne.

Distinguished artists and connoisseurs of stage design, such as Penrhyn Stanlaws and Paul Iribe (the great Parisian designer), contribute their special talent to Paramount. In short, it is a fact that Paramount utilizes the services of all sorts of skill and craftsmanship whose function ordinary picture producers are not even aware of.

Paramount spends more on the perfect titling of great feature pictures than some producers spend on the whole job.

Paramount has a special Fashion Atelier in Paris so that the women in the audience of your theatre shall get le dernier cri in gowns and hats with every Paramount Picture. See Paramount Pictures and you see the new Paris styles first.

Paramount has first call on the greatest American stories in the greatest American magazines when the stories are suitable for the films.

Every form of printed or spoken drama that might be suitable for Paramount Pictures is examined. Everything useful published in Italian, Spanish, German or French is steadily translated. Synopses are made of every stage play produced in America, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, London and Rome.

No one else can give the exhibitor or motion picture enthusiast half as much.

It all comes down to immense organization, and Paramount has it.

Every 20th person you meet in the street today will see a Paramount Picture today!

The simple way to tell a good theatre

Not a good theatre anywhere but books as many Paramount Pictures as its patrons can throng to see!

Counting foreign theatres, over one hundred million people paid to see Paramount Pictures in 1920.

Your cue is—find the words "A Paramount Picture" in the newspaper advertisements of your theatre, or in the lobbies or on billboards.

Find them, before you go in, for that always means a great show and a crowded house

What the Pilgrim Fathers Sought

A Tercentenary Tribute to Those Brave Adventurers for Christianity

By
REV. HENRY VAN DYKE, D.D., LL.D.*

THE Pilgrim Fathers have been honored on their 300th Anniversary in three great countries—England, their birthplace; Holland, their asylum; and America their abiding place. And highly have they been praised, but not one bit beyond their merit. Their adventure was brave, their spirit was indomitable, their effort was heroic, and their achievement was great—great not only in its large effects and results, but great, I venture to say, in the simplicity and the unconsciousness with which they did the thing that they came to do, namely, found a new English-speaking community in the wilderness beyond the Atlantic.

I have often wondered how those old Pilgrim Fathers would enjoy these celebrations in which they play so prominent a part in spirit, being absent in the body. Some of them, perhaps, would be found rather jarred by those Mayflower passengers who complained so bitterly when the captain of the ship cut off their beer. But the thing which would astonish the Pilgrims most would be to hear themselves praised as Lloyd George praised them the other day, as the Apostles of religious liberty in the new world. That they certainly were not, and they never intended to be. They were seekers of religious freedom for themselves, and in order to find that and to keep it, they were willing to do whatever was necessary.

Of religious liberty for other people they thought very little. They did not conceive it to be their business. So much religious liberty as was good for the world I think they thought the Divine Power, by which all things are predestinated, would work out. Their purpose was chiefly to get their church going, to worship God according to their own conscience, and to build up a going concern from a commercial point of view on these New England shores. That is what they were after.

Their little congregation of separatists, a very democratic group, consisted in the main of people of very moderate means. The postmaster of the little town of Scrooby was one of them, and he was the most distinguished man of the lot, I think. But they wanted to worship in their own way, and they had the great good fortune to have a magnificent minister, John Robinson—one of the greatest of those men whom England produced in the gloom of the Reformation, one of the strongest, kindest and best of men, a strict Calvinist, and with a spirit that made up even for that.

THEY were persecuted and prosecuted in their little asylum at Scrooby, under that fat old bigot, James I, so they packed up their grips and took their wives and children and fled to Holland, the only country in Europe where the idea of religious liberty was taught and practiced at that time. But when those blessed Pilgrims got to Amsterdam they found two other separatist congregations there already, and those separatist congregations were of the most strict, orthodox and quarrelsome type. They were involved in all sorts of disputes. If you want to know more about it read Dexter's books on Congregationalism, about the old clothes controversy in Amsterdam, about the minister's wife wearing the topish hat, and women going about with high heels, and an endless quarrel about women's dress which can only be settled right by allowing women to settle it themselves.

It was in 1608 that they went to Amsterdam. They did not stay a year. They could not stand it at Amsterdam—the accent on the last syllable was too strong. So that they went down to Leyden, that little Dutch city, the seat of a famous university. There they were hospitably welcomed. They found a way to earn their living, but rather hard lines. They had to work hard, conditions were not favorable, wages were low, industry was not in a flourishing condition at that time; but they did succeed in earning their living and that little company stayed there eleven years in Leyden, under Pastor Robinson, worshipping according to their conscience with great pleasure and convenience, and winning respect all around.

When the Pilgrims came to go away from Amsterdam the burgomaster and the alderman of the town gave them a testimonial saying that he regarded their going with regret, and that during all that time they had had no lawsuit and no trouble with the Pilgrims. That again is contrary to the common idea. They were quiet and peaceable folks, except when they were provoked. Moreover, in Holland they paid their own way. It was hospitality that they received in Holland, but it was based on what is best known as the "Dutch treat." So they sent out a company, the younger and the stronger ones, to the number of about one hundred—not with the minister, because he could not be spared from the larger number which stayed there in Leyden, but with their ruling elder, William Brewster, as their leader.

They went into the Mayflower, the story of whose perilous and heroic voyage you know so well that I need not repeat it. They were drifting north of where they intended to go. They intended to go to the northern part of Virginia, the tract known as Virginia in those days. They were driven by bad weather and got tangled up in the shoals of Cape Cod. They made their first landing on Cape Cod; and they didn't like it, and they went as far as what is known as the site of the town of Plymouth, and there they found better water, better land, better prospects, and made up their minds they would settle there.

THERE is a curious blend of principle—regular Yankee principle—and adventure in those old fellows who came here at that time. They trusted in God and took mighty good care to keep their powder dry. They were peace lovers, but you could not count too much on their consistent customs.

What was it that they sought when they went over there? Two things. First of all religious freedom. They say themselves that they wanted to have a state where they might, with the liberty of conscience, enjoy the pure and simple worship of God, and where their children under them might grow up in the holy ways of the Lord. They were quite sure that the ways which they had were the holy ways of the Lord, and they wanted their children to walk in those ways.

Second, the thing which they wanted and this comes right next to the first thing, they wanted a chance to build up by agriculture and trade, to work out of doors—they were out-of-doors people, the Pilgrim Fathers—and they wanted a chance to build up a self-supporting community with such prosperity as Providence might bestow.

It has been the fashion to draw a sharp contrast between the Pilgrims of the Mayflower and the Dutch immigrants of the Half Moon who settled at New Amsterdam ten years before. There is a shade of difference between their faith, but it is a mighty small shade. The Pilgrims founded a religious community with commercial principles; the Dutchmen founded a commercial community with religious principles. They, I think, intended and tried to deal fairly and live decently with the Indians. They succeeded somewhat, and they failed somewhat, because there were trouble-makers amongst the colonists and rascals amongst the Indians, and where those two classes exist you cannot have peace except through power. In other words, the police force is essential to the life of the community.

At that time the Pilgrims were rather mild in their treatment of people who did not agree with them in faith and worship, but the Puritans did it on avowed principles, while the Pilgrims did it simply as a friendly practice. And they were reproached for it by their stricter Puritan brethren who spoke of the Pilgrims as mongrel Dutch. Well, if they were mongrels, they chose a pretty good stock to mix with, didn't they? We can not understand New England history unless we get hold of the relations between the Pilgrims at Plymouth and the Puritans who settled Massachusetts Colony a few years later.

WHAT was the difference? I may be considered as an impartial student of the case. There was, first, a difference in ecclesiastical theory. The Puritans were non-conformists who stayed in the Church of England and tried to purify it from within; the Pilgrims were separatists who came out of the Church of England and set up their own churches. They thought that was the best way to do it, and on the whole I think they were right. In other words, I don't think they would have had as much good influence in the way of liberalizing if they had tried that boring-from-within process as they did have by going out and saying, "This is the way to run our community, and it is the way we will do."

There was a difference in the way of action. The Puritans founded the state on the churches, and admitted only their members to full citizenship. The Pilgrims maintained the church under protection of the state, and one of those leaders, that little gamecock captain, Miles Standish, was never a church member at all.

Third, there was a difference in the social organization. The Puritans including persons of wealth and title, had a flavor of aristocracy and special privilege. The Pilgrims, being of the middle class and moderate means, were distinctly more democratic. All classes of men, masters and servants, went to town meetings.

Finally, the difference I put at the end—but which may be plainly felt by those who read the record of the early days—the difference in temper, tone and spirit. The Puritans were theoretical, dogmatic, and absolute. The Pilgrims were practical experimenters and

...ed to test their doctrine by the way it worked, which there is something to be said. There is good authority in the New Testament, anyway.

TWO causes I think helped to give this general character to the Pilgrim and the Puritan. First, John Robinson, who was not a literary theologian, was a liberal and progressive soul, and warned his own flock that they must not think that they had full knowledge. He counselled them not to scoff at their brothers, whether they were of the Puritan or Christian faith—not to scorn their brothers who sought for other ends. That was good talk. I don't care whether he did stick to the five points or come closely to them. It makes no difference, if he had the spirit of the masses, the spirit in which lies our only hope today.

They were also fortunate in spending twelve years in Holland. They learned a great deal there, and if you read Douglas Campbell's book, you will have an idea of some of the things that they learned. You will also find some other things that I don't think they really learned there, but that they brought from England.

The Pilgrims, compared with the Puritans, were putting forth no special claim of having been commissioned to reform the universe, but applying themselves to the task of making the Pilgrim colony a going concern. They built log houses, they hunted, planted, fished, and traded. They had more meetings and programs than the people of Massachusetts today. But the Pilgrims got their land from the Indians by treaty and learned from them how to plant corn, when the young oak leaves are about the size of a mouse's ear, and how to manure it by putting three alewives in each hill of corn. One of the things in their favor was their willingness to learn.

Then there was the Mayflower document, the famous Compact. I thought I would find there some pronouncements on labor, but nothing there. They agreed to form a civil-body politic, and agreed thereafter to "enact such laws, ordinances, constitutions and offices from time to time as shall be thought most meet and convenient for the general good." And they did not make many laws, either. The laws of the Plymouth Colony, compared with the laws of Massachusetts Bay Colony, are as one drop in the bucket—very few indeed compared with the Massachusetts Bay laws. But with sensible men like Brewster and Robinson and Winslow and Standish to apply them, even if Standish was not a church member, they worked well, and they kept the colony in order.

They began with a limited communism in land and labor. They soon found it would not work and it made the lazy and the shiftless a burden on the industrious. It leveled down instead of up, as communism always does. It would not work, and it never will work. Communism is the enemy, both of Christianity and of freedom, and we can not take better example from the Pilgrim Fathers in anything than from the way in which they promptly rejected that communistic experiment when they found it would not work.

IN THEIR dealings with trouble-makers of various kinds they were mild when possible and firm when necessary. They did not like the Quakers, but they never excluded them, as the Massachusetts Bay people did. They were not particularly fond of Roger Williams. They let him preach for a while in the Plymouth church, and then they encouraged him to go to Salem, and when he got to Salem they punished him and then he went and founded the first free religious colony in the United States, namely, Rhode Island.

The witchcraft superstition struck the Pilgrims. They passed laws condemning the witches to death, but there were only two trials for witchcraft in that acquittals. There was Thomas Morton of Merrimack, a mouthed, lascivious person who spoke in Massachusetts Bay and set about to debauch the Indians. He sold them firearms and powder. The Separatists, who were looking down on the Pilgrim separatists, knew them as bold men and asked to help in the emergency. Little Miles Standish, an up from Plymouth with his musketeers, conquered Merrymount without loss of life, and carried off the culprit, Morton, to Plymouth. And then he was sent to England. For what? To be tried for selling muskets and powder to the Indians, and Plymouth colonists paid the expense of sending him over. And the Maypole was cut down, not by the Pilgrim, Standish, but by the Puritan, Endicott.

It is not possible to follow this distinction further. It is true of course that after a certain number of years, say thirty or forty years, the Plymouth Colony and the Pilgrims were absorbed in the richer, and larger, and stronger Puritan Colony of Massachusetts Bay and practically, to all intents and purposes, they became one, the Pilgrims carrying with them from their old principles, and the Puritans contributing the stern and staunch character which enabled them to be the backbone of the New England settlers.

To keep the colonists of the New World in order and united, strict regulations were necessary. Tithes, taxes and Sabbatical laws seemed absolutely necessary. Massachusetts went no further in this respect than had Virginia. When your southern friends snap their fingers at Puritanism, ask them what was done there.

THE so-called blue-laws was a vague thing gotten up by a reformer. You could not play an innocent game, you could not even go to sleep without fine and punishment. You could not kiss your wife in public—but then, who wants to? That is not where I want to kiss mine. Strict rules, no doubt, but remember they were emergency rules. The whole stretcher of Christian civilization was on trial on this new continent—Puritans and Pilgrims, Dutch and cavaliers, in opposition among themselves, but one in this respect, and their errors were negligible in comparison with the result.

These influences have emerged into a Christian nation, because of the faith of their founders in New England and New Amsterdam and everywhere, the faith of their fathers, among whom the Pilgrim Fathers must be counted first. The Pilgrims were not the apostles of religious liberty in America. Roger Williams, the Baptist, and William Penn, the Quaker, deserve that name; but the Pilgrim Fathers, coming earlier, fought a harder fight. They bore the torch of a free continent to these western shores. They suffered all and dared all to worship God and live in freedom. By the light they carried, by the courage they showed in the face of danger and death we dedicate our manhood to the cause of a free church in a free state.

Religion and Morality in Education

By S. G. HEFFELBOWER

WASHINGTON said in his farewell address: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports."

Would anybody be likely to conclude from inspecting our schools that religion and morality were indispensable for our political well-being?

The casual visitor to our public schools would find well-organized instruction in every field except religion and morals. Should he attend a meeting of educators he would be impressed by their zeal to make education economically and politically practical; he would also now and then hear of the importance of cultural interests; and occasionally, fortunately with increasing frequency, religion and morality would be emphasized as important factors for developing character. But he would not conclude from the amount of attention that is paid to them by our school men that they are "indispensable."

Ever since the founding of our Republic we have magnified education as the guarantee of our liberties. We think of our free school system and of our free institutions as inseparable. Americans have a naive faith in education as a panacea for political ills. But we do not discriminate. We think of education in a very general way as that which our schools provide. Washington and the other founders of our nation had a very different conception of education. They thought of it as a social institution for developing "virtue and intelligence" in our coming citizens. We emphasize efficiency. They believed that government of the people, by the people, and for the people would be secure if the people were wise and good. They were not satisfied with the old Baconian doctrine that knowledge is power. That was the Prussian notion of education, and we unwittingly hold it to a great extent. They aimed to secure the power that intelligence brings combined with right regulative principles of conduct; and if they emphasized one of these aspects more than the other it was the ideal phase of education that they magnified.

Today our school systems are dominated by something very different. Efficiency has become a fad; it overshadows ideal values. We are menaced by a soul-dwarfing utilitarianism. We think of education almost entirely as intended to develop knowledge and skill. These are not moral forces in any real sense. In and of themselves they have no moral value, they are non-moral; they can be just as effective for evil as for good. They become valuable assets of our civilization only when they are directed by right ideals. That is, the things that we emphasize most in our educational systems as at present organized are inadequate to develop good citizens. Knowledge and skill produce efficient human agents, but they carry no guarantee within themselves that the resulting actions will be good. A regulative ideal is absolutely necessary, and this is found on another level.

The Heritage

By Arthur Wallace Peach

THERE is a beauty, grave and wise,
That youth has never guessed:
Nor gained from all the richest lore
With which their dreams are blest.

It is the gift the kind years bear
To those grown old who know
The legacies that grief can bring
And joys before they go.

The path explored by youth unwalked,
The heights they never scale,
The meaning of some starry dusks,
The mists within the vale.

These they may dream, but never know
Until they too are old,
And o'er their dreams the wings of truth
Their quiet comfort fold.

The riches of the years—they are
The heritage of those Who see upon the autumn hills
The still prophetic snows.

And know that they must ever pass
And bring the miracle
Of spring to earth and to gray hearts
A peace ineffable!

AS HAS been said, there is no alchemy by which golden deeds can be made to flow from leaden motives. If we are to have good citizens we must develop right ideals in our children. And religion and morality are the most fruitful fountain heads of noble endeavor that man has ever known; not merely morality, the knowledge of right and wrong and the choice of the right, but also the recognition of the fact that human conduct is related to the moral order of the world under a Moral Head. When a man espouses a righteous cause it is hard for him to believe that the authority of right and justice and love is merely the utilitarian counsel of prudence. It comes to him as an eternal "thou shalt" as from the moral order of the universe thundering his soul. If we just follow our moral judgments far enough they lead us to the throne of God.

If such is the case, if learning without religion and morality is, ethically blind, any educational system which fails to provide for training our children in these lines is lame and defective, and the product is bound to be defective also. Of course we know this; it is preached to us and we tell it to each other; but has it got into our educational programs as it should? Is our educational system so organized that it puts first things first? How many superintendents and school boards arrange their courses and select their teachers with moral and religious training in view?

But considerable progress has been made of late; and much wholesome discussion has been taking place, notably in New York and Philadelphia; programs for religious and moral instruction are actually being formed. Nevertheless it is true that proper provision for the religious and moral training of children is the great unsolved problem of education in this country.

American Protestants Getting Together

A Review of the Work of the Federal Council Meeting

By

Rev. PETER AINSLIE, D.D., LL.D.

ONE of the things now occurring in the life of our nation are disheartening, but the recent quadrennial meeting of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which was in Boston, was perhaps the most heartening thing for these times. It is not enough to say thirty denominations were represented, but the representatives in many instances were the leaders in various denominations who came from all parts of the country. The reports of the various commissions indicated not only care, but clear thinking and prophetic vision. The addresses were of a high order and every session teemed with interest.

The Federal Council had its beginning in Philadelphia in 1908. Some were very confident, filling a needed place in American Christianity. Others regarded it as an experiment. For some time, movements were uncertain because it was not clear. Confidence had to be gained. Results had to be shown in order to enlarge its scope. All this has been done. Its leadership is in the hands of wise men.

Dr. E. D. Sanford, who was its first president, worked under great difficulties to steer it successfully through the uncertain years of its early history. Dr. Charles S. Macfarland succeeded Dr. Sanford. He has guided it with remarkable statesmanship. When one reads the reports and observes what has been done he is amazed not only at securing the co-operation of groups of men, but the great responsibility of financing the work of the various commissions and their extensive program of operation.

There is no single institution in America that has so tied up our interests with Europe during the period of the war as the Federal Council of the Churches. Dr. Macfarland has made frequent trips to Europe, and has always borne the message of confidence and fraternity. The European governments have recognized this service by many beautiful expressions of appreciation. It was gratifying to all of us when General Nivelle of France decorated four officers of the Federal Council in the name of the French Government. These were: Dr. Macfarland, who received the Order of Commander of the Legion of Honor, which is the highest decoration given by the French Government; Dr. Frank Mason North, the retiring president of the Federal Council, who was given the Order of Officer of Public Instruction, as was also Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, secretary of the Commission on International Justice and Good-Will; President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin College, one of the commissioners in the Council, who was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

LIKEWISE the interests of the Orient are tied up with the work of the Council. Dr. Sidney L. Gulick has been the prophetic voice in matters relating to Oriental problems. He lived in Japan for twenty years and nearly half of that time was connected with the Imperial University. He is able to see conditions as no one who has not lived in both countries could see them; and he goes straight to the heart of things as they are.

The famine conditions of China received warmest considerations of co-operation, as well as the starving multitudes of Europe under the appeal of Mr. Herbert Hoover. Perhaps no finer thing was said by him than that he had rather have the American flag flying in the hearts of the three and a half millions of children he is trying to save from starvation than to have it flying over every capital in Europe.

The meeting at St. Paul's Episcopal Church, when President W. H. P. Faunce and Dr. Robert E. Speer spoke on "American Ideals: A Heritage from the Pilgrims," and the meeting at Trinity Episcopal Church, where Phillips Brooks so long ministered, were occasions of hope. At the latter meeting Dr. R. C. Gillie, president of the Free Church Council of England and Wales, and Dr. John R. Mott made notable addresses. The former pleaded for the international mind and the international conscience, and the latter told of the moral, physical and industrial chaotic conditions of Europe. Both were appeals to live beyond our own country and serve for the good of all. If one were to select which session was the best and most profitable, he would find dozens of persons selecting other sessions. In fact the whole Council presented a forward look as no gathering in America has presented in recent times.

WE CAN no longer speak of the Federal Council's being an experiment. It is the most outstanding Christian unity movement in the world, and yet not talking about Christian unity in any technical sense. It has simply been a great force bringing Christians of various Protestant communions together and doing the task that Christians ought to be doing together. It has found a field of work and is an organization so permanent and so resourceful and so wide in its conceptions that all parts of the various churches must awaken to the great possibilities for themselves through the channels of the Federal Council.

The report of the Committee on War and the Religious Outlook, which was presented by Professor William Adams Brown, had in it alone the worth of study for any single conference. It dealt with the attitude of the world toward the Church as well as the church's attempt to adjust itself to present-day conditions. It dwelt upon Christian unity and other rising passions in the thought of the Church. Concerning Christian unity the report says:

"With the subject of church unity we reach the very heart of our problem, for it brings us face to face with the nature of the Church itself. What is this Church which is to do all these things of which we have been speaking? Where is it to be found and how is it to function? When we turn for an answer to these questions we find no single voice which is qualified to speak. What we see is not the Church, but churches, each with its own independent history and traditions, each facing its own part of the common task in greater or less independence of its sister churches. It is clear that if the Church is to recover its rightful place in the life of our time and to render the service which is imperatively demanded of it, this state of things must cease.

"This recognition of the need of a united Church is one of the outstanding features of our present-day Christianity. It is forced upon us, as we have seen, by the practical exigencies of the case. At each of the points of our previous survey we have met it, in connection with our study of conditions in the Army, in our survey of the foreign field, in our review of the new home missions, in our attempt to define the duty of the Church to the social and economic issues of the day. These are issues that transcend present ecclesiastical divisions. They require a united approach.

THE report of the Committee on Methods of Co-operation awakened lively interest. Instead of being referred to the business committee it was acted upon forthwith. It indicated removing the stakes for enlarged co-operation and service. The adoption of its recommendations marked a distinctive epoch in the history of the Federal Council. These recommendations are as follows:

"1. The Council believes that the time has come for fuller action on its part in the fulfillment of the purpose of its establishment 'for the prosecution of work that can be better done in union than in separation.' The Council instructs the Executive and Administrative Committees to plan the work of the Council in accordance with this view, ever having in mind its duly defined field of constitutional action and taking such steps as will maintain the closest possible relationships between it and the constituent denominations.

"2. The Council authorizes the Executive Committee, as assured resources may warrant, to strengthen the secretarial staff of the Council by the appointment of such additional secretaries as it may deem necessary to enable the Council to carry forward a larger work with the confidence and support of the churches.

"3. The Council requests the constituent bodies to provide for the support of the Council and its work on the scale of $300,000 per annum for the next two years, and it asks these bodies to accept their equitable apportionment of this amount, as may be suggested by the Administrative Committee.

"4. The Council authorizes such a conference with the inter-board agencies as has been suggested, for the purposes specified, with the understanding that any general plan of co-operation involving the denominations in any way not already approved by them in connection with the Federal Council or the inter-board bodies must be referred to the denominational courts or other authorities.

"5. The Council approves the statement of the Committee on Methods of Co-operation with regard to the readiness of the Council to adjust its organization, within its constitutional character and responsibility to the churches, in any way that may be necessary to enable it to be of service to the churches or to any of their agencies.

"6. The Council refers to the Executive Committee with power the article numbered eight, of the by-laws with regard to the Commissions of the Council, and authorizes it to make any ad interim changes which it may deem wise in the commission and committee organization (including the Administrative Committee) and to report to the next meeting of the Council the appropriate wording of by-law eight.

"7. The Council expresses the conviction that out of the experiences and discussions of the present time there shall come the achievement of a richer form of expression of that spirit of fellowship, service, and co-operation in which the Federal Council began and which it is its duty and its joy to promote.

DR. FRANK MASON NORTH has made a good president, through the critical period of the last four years. No one doubts the wisdom of the Council's choice of him for this high post of honor at the St. Louis conference four years ago. Dr. Robert E. Speer is the new president and comes to the office with a prophet's vision. Perhaps no man in America has the confidence of all parts of the Church so generally as has Dr. Speer.

If one would go over the list of names on the program, or sitting in the upper corner of the hall, were to look over the building, there would be scores of names of leaders in the Church whose presence on the platform would command leadership and whose utterances through the press are eagerly followed. There were: Bishop W. F. McDowell, Dr. Frederick

Then there were men from abroad. In addition to those who have been mentioned was Dr. Alexander Ramsey, former moderator of the Presbyterian Church in England, besides other representatives from Great Britain. Among these was Mr. Harold Spender, who at one of the luncheons gave a charming presentation of Mr. Lloyd George. There were also representatives from China, Holland, Belgium, France, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Mexico and Switzerland.

The conference moved to its task seriously and in the genius of statesmanship. It has furnished a meeting ground for the various Protestant communions. No one of the delegates would think of breaking this fellowship, but their concern was and ever will be how we can form a closer co-operation. Never has such a group from all parts of the Church met under such hopeful outlook. The Federal Council has served humbly but earnestly; has not dictated, but has gathered up the united voice of the Church in its message to all. The Committee on Message presented a message to be sent abroad, which conveys its hope, its courage and its possibilities. The day of larger things is at hand and God has raised the men for the task.

1. The man who does not have any is dead; and maybe he has some.
2. They are a miscellaneous lot: poverty, riches, debt, luxury, too much time, not enough work, play, love, hate, other people, self, sickness, fear, family troubles, disobedient sons and daughters, and SIN.
3. But all problems call for struggle; and struggle is better than stagnation.
4. It is better to live by the side of a river that may become a freshet than by the side of a pool that is mostly scum.
5. Moreover, a problem worked out for one's self is growth; worked out for another it is heart satisfaction.
6. When God created man He wrapped him up in problems. There was no other way to create him.
7. It is no humiliation to fail to work out a problem; it is a humiliation to let the problem crow over us.
8. There is no human problem too great for solution, given these three factors: time, prayer, and divine help.
9. Because the solution goes over into the next world ought not to worry us. It is the final result that counts.
10. The greatest problem of all is learning how to love God and fellow man supremely. O all ye sons and daughters of men, burdened with many troubles, if ye will learn this, it will solve all the rest.

Religious Minorities in Transylvania

A Study of Church Conditions in the New Roumanian Territory

By HENRY A. ATKINSON

(General Secretary of the Church Peace Union)

WE WILL always have oppressed peoples and minorities crying out for relief just as long as we allow sections of a country with all its human units and their possessions to be traded among the Powers and changed from one government to another without consulting the wishes or inclinations of the people involved—just as one moves or sacrifices a pawn or a bishop in a game of chess.

There are racial and religious minorities now groaning under the oppressive rule of strangers in a dozen different countries of Europe. One of the most spectacular and in some respects the most perplexing situations of this kind is that in Transylvania. This country lies between Hungary proper and Roumania, and has a total area of 22,017 square miles, with a population of 2,678,367 divided as follows:

Magyars (including Szekels).....	918,217
Germans.....	234,085
Roumanians.....	1,472,021
All others.....	154,044

While the Roumanians constitute a clear majority of the population; in point of culture, wealth and ability, the Magyars and Saxons are the dominant races. Now this country has been given to Roumania by the terms of the Trianon peace treaty, and the Hungarians are bitterly complaining of the oppression under which they are suffering at the hands of the new government. The Hungarian government is carrying on a world-wide propaganda in the interests of securing a re-united Hungary.

Three Bishops of Transylvania—one a Presbyterian, one a Roman Catholic and one a Unitarian—joined in a strong statement of protest to the Peace Conference. This statement was made the basis of a speech before the House of Lords by Viscount Bryce on December 17, 1919, and attracted a great deal of attention not only in the English press but throughout France and the United States. Committees from the churches of England, Scotland and America have visited the country and made a comprehensive study of the question involved, therefore we are safe in saying that Transylvania has received more attention and consequently its problems have become better known than those in almost any other country affected by the war.

IN THESE days when anyone expresses an opinion on any serious subject, we immediately ask for his authority. For a year I had been receiving and reading all the material put out by the various agencies, boards, and committees dealing with the problems in Transylvania, so when in June of 1920 I was asked to visit Austria, Hungary and Transylvania for the purpose of studying the questions at first hand, I gladly accepted a place on the Commission that was later appointed by the National Committee for the Protection of Religious Minorities, of which Mr. Taft, Mr. Bryan, Mr. Lansing, Mr. Hughes, Cardinal Gibbons, Mr. Morgenthau, Judge Elkus, Dr. Arthur J. Brown, Dr. William P. Merrill, Mr. Hamilton Holt, Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, and a hundred other men prominent in the church and civic life of America are members.

Our Commission first visited Austria and from there went to Budapest, where we were received by the General Conventus of the Reformed Church of Hungary, and spent a week meeting the various boards and committees and discussing the whole problem of the future of the Hungarian nation and its relation to its neighbors. By the terms of the treaty Hungary has been so cut to pieces that there is but little left of this originally powerful nation. There is suffering and deep privation and want on every hand. The churches, hospitals, schools and other institutions are greatly crippled in their work. However, these problems can be met, for Hungary will eventually right herself, and inasmuch as the church, state and school are so closely related, full support will be given to all these institutions. It is in those portions of the former Hungarian kingdom, now cut off from the motherland, where the suffering is most intense, and the problems presented most difficult to solve.

From Budapest we went directly to Bucharest, the capital and chief city of Roumania. It is in this city that East and West meet. The civilization follows the type of the West, but its spirit is of the Orient. Here we called on Mr. James G. Bailey, who was in charge of affairs at the American Legation. Through his kindness we were able to meet with some of the leading men of the church and government of Roumania.

We found in the Metropolitan of Bucharest, Miron Christea, a man of remarkable ability and the head of the National Church of Roumania. He himself is a Transylvanian. We told him frankly what we proposed doing, and discussed fully the whole question of religious liberty. He gave us a letter to Professor Lupas, one of the leaders of the Greek Church in Transylvania, and the head of the University at Kolozsvár. We also met Professor Demetrescu, Dean, and Dr. Simeon Popescu, Secretary of the Faculty of the Theological Seminary.

FROM Bucharest we went by train through the Carpathian Mountains into Transylvania, arriving at the city of Brasso early in the morning.

It is impossible to describe the majesty and glory of the Carpathians by moonlight. No one in our party will ever forget the sensation that came over us as we climbed the dizzy heights of that wall which stands between the Orient and Occident. At Brasso we found ourselves on the edge of the great Transylvanian plain. This city of some 50,000 people is in the heart of the Saxon section of the country, and is essentially a German city. There is in it, however, as in other parts of Transylvania, a substratum of Roumanian life and influence.

There is little doubt that the original inhabitants of the country were Dacians from whom the modern Roumanians claim to be the direct descendants. Every other nationality, whatever may be its claim by reasons of long residence or a superior type of culture, is, after all, an immigrant, for the Roumanians, or those closely akin to them, were the settlers of this land. Every other nationality has come in at a later date. The Magyars have been in Transylvania for a thousand years, and although the country has belonged to Hungary only since 1868, it is true that the dominating influence and culture in Transylvania for five hundred years at least has been Hungarian.

The church life of Transylvania follows very closely the national life. The Magyars are all Presbyterians, Unitarians, or Roman Catholics. The Saxons, speaking German, are practically all Lutherans. Out of 240 Lutheran parishes all are German except six, which use the Hungarian language. The Roumanians without exception are members of the Greek Oriental Church. The figures showing the total population by percentage of religion are as follows:

Greek Oriental.....	56.6
Reformed Churches.....	14.9
Roman Catholics.....	14.0
Lutherans.....	8.6
Unitarians.....	2.5
Jews.....	2.4
Unclassified less than 1 per cent.

and interwoven that it is impossible to take of these elements in the life of the East involving all the others. In South Asia, and in the Balkan States especially, and state have always been considered one theme. The churches are the strongest allies of government in working out its plans and aims. Any one who is familiar with the history of the division of the Roman Empire, and those leading up to its decline, and who will take the trouble to study the geography of these countries will once see the reason why there is this close relation between church and state. The Roman Empire was divided on a basis of ecclesiastical opinions. The geographical lines which marked the division between East and West crossed the territory in which we find today the most perplexing and complicated religious and national problems.

There is in Transylvania no such thing as religious persecution per se. The Magyar churches are being persecuted not because they are Presbyterian or Unitarian or Roman Catholic, but because they are Magyar, and in the opinion of the present government opposed to Roumania. The Roumanians are not trying to make Greek Catholics out of the Presbyterians, but are trying to make Roumanians out of the Hungarians.

Transylvania was given to Roumania by the Trianon Treaty. The geographical limits are given in full details in article 27, paragraph 3, of this treaty. Under its terms the inhabitants of Transylvania have a year after the ratification of the Treaty to decide whether they will accept Roumanian citizenship, or whether they will leave the country. There is no doubt but what the Roumanian government is using every means, foul as well as fair, to force the Hungarians to become Roumanian citizens or to get out. All over Transylvania the men who have been in authority are being deposed from office, and Roumanians put into their places. Life for the Hungarians is being made just as uncomfortable as is possible. A great many of these persecutions are petty as the result of the administration of justice being left in the hands of small men. Many of the new officials are the same ignorant Roumanians who suffered abuses at the hands of the Hungarians under the old régime. They have been looked down upon and despised by their Hungarian neighbors, and kept "in their place" by the powerful Hungarian government. Now by the fortunes of war they find themselves in the position of the masters, and it is but natural that they should seek to square off old accounts by turning any weapons at hand against their former oppressors.

I have carefully gone over all the stories of outrages and persecutions and there is not a single instance that I can find where a church or minister has suffered at the hands of the Roumanian government that is not directly attributable to political rather than ecclesiastical causes. For instance, a Calvinistic clergyman was threatened with arrest because he repeated the Lord's Prayer at a funeral service. The ignorant Roumanian officials thought that the expression "Thy Kingdom Come" referred to the Magyar Kingdom. Another Presbyterian minister, George Fosztó, was charged in the courts with repeating the Lord's Prayer, but instead of saying "Thy Kingdom Come," he said, "Hungary, Thy Kingdom Come." In the village of Szekelydobo the Presbyterian minister, Stephen Bene, was arrested, put in chains and forced by the Roumanian soldiers to dance in a public place, the charge against him being that some years before he had forced Greek Catholic families to become members of his church.

In the Lutheran church at Kolozsvár the censor forbade the singing of the hymn "Do Not Despair, My Little Troop." This church also got into difficulty with the Roumanian authorities because it refused to ring its bells in honor of the entry of the Roumanian troops into the city. A Unitarian clergyman was arrested on the suspicion that he had hidden a pistol in his house. The pistol was found, but he said that it had been hidden by a servant. Another Unitarian was arrested on the grounds that he was a socialist agitator, and another that he was preaching sedition and urging the people to revolt.

NATURALLY, the ministers, especially in the small villages, are the leaders of the people, and being nationalists who insist upon the use of the Hungarian language, it is only natural that they should fall victims to the new powers enthroned by the peace conference. A peculiar situation has developed within the Lutheran Church. The pastor at Kolozsvár, a Hungarian, was tried by an ecclesiastical council of his own church on the ground that he neglected his church duties to give himself to political agitation, and thus brought the cause of religion into disrepute. There is an abundance of evidence just like this, but all of it when put into the crucible produces only one fact and that is that all persecution is found in politics rather than in religion.

At Brassó we hired an automobile and drove over nearly all of Transylvania. We visited some fifty villages and towns. We talked with the pastors of the leading churches, we saw the people in their homes, and by this close contact came to see the effect of the military government upon the people, and from our conferences with the leaders felt that we had arrived at a pretty fair judgment as to the actual situation respecting the religious and political life of Transylvania.

We were told by the Roumanians that if the Hungarians in Transylvania will give allegiance to the Roumanian Government, the Magyar churches will Travel is difficult in Eastern Europe these days, and the trains, which seem queer and small to American eyes, are crowded to the limit, with people traveling on the roofs and occupying all available space at once be free from the principal persecutions against which the leaders now complain. But one of the leading churchmen at Kolozsvár said to us, "If any Hungarian pastor swears allegiance to the Roumanian government, he cannot stay in his pulpit or in his community twenty-four hours." Speaking of himself he also said: "Even if I should desire to become a Roumanian citizen under the present circumstances, I would not dare face public opinion and take the oath of allegiance."

I have just learned that the Royal Roumanian Minister of the Interior, Argetoianu, visited Kolozsvár on September 18 and received a delegation of Hungarians. The Transylvanian newspaper men, through their President, B. Szeckely, laid before the Minister complaints concerning the persecutions and injustices practised upon the Hungarian press and its representatives. Two of the leading business men appeared on behalf of the Transylvanian business men. Finally the Minister received a large delegation representing the churches, headed by the Bishop of the Reformed Church, Charles Nagy, who presented a memorial. In the course of his presentation speech, the Bishop said:

"The Transylvanian Hungarians have come to the conclusion that they have to reckon with the new situation arisen for them. They have become Roumanian subjects 'ipso facto' and desire no more and no less than the benefit of the full rights to which Roumanian subjects are entitled. This, on their part, would have the natural corollary of fidelity to the Roumanian State. The delegation asks for remedy, notably in two directions: in regard to the execution of orders of eviction and concerning the treatment of the churches. By fulfilling this wish of the delegation the government would deserve the gratitude of Transylvanian Hungarians."

It remains to be seen whether or not Roumania is big enough to grant protection and that freedom which has been guaranteed by the Minorities Treaty, which she signed.

The Saxons have become Roumanian citizens, and while many of the petty annoyances still continue and the former officers of the government have nearly all lost their places and Roumanians been put into the seats of authority, still the Roumanian government assumes a very different attitude toward the German Lutheran Church than it does toward the Hungarian Church. The leading pastors of the German churches have been given places in the Roumanian government and appointed to positions of honor and authority in their respective communities. The Roumanian government is also helping to support the Lutheran Church, and while its support is inadequate, still it is better than no help at all.

THE difficulties are exceedingly serious with the Reformed churches, which have heretofore been supported entirely by help of the government. The Roman Catholic churches are in the same condition, and the Lutherans to a large degree. The Unitarians have been practically free from governmental control because they have generally assumed the responsibility for their own expenses. The Hungarians represent a solid nationalistic and linguistic block in Roumania. The Presbyterian and Reformed churches to which the majority of these Hungarians belong, a part of the Conventus at Budapest. All orders from Budapest, and by reason of the change in government this direct line of communication has been broken. The support of these churches is also gone.

In the school life we found other serious difficulties. The governing council of the schools has been officially suspended by decree of the Roumanian government, and the functions in all the higher, primary and middle schools of the state have been stopped. Thus 3 academies, 33 middle schools, 31 professional schools, 2,641 primary schools and 392 kindergartens have been suspended. This has thrown out of employment 5,095 teachers and 357 kindergarten directors. In these schools there were about 160,000 Hungarian children. The Roumanians have brought this about by simply expropriating the property and cutting off the revenue from these schools.

In place of Hungarian schools, Roumanian schools have been substituted, and their staffs of Hungarian teachers being removed, the school buildings are occupied by Roumanian schools with Roumanian professors and teachers; or else the buildings have been shut up or turned over for other purposes. The Roumanian government is apparently determined to block the progress of Hungarian culture and ultimately put an end to the use of the Hungarian language in Transylvania. In justification for this policy the Roumanians and their apologists point out that this is exactly what has been done by the Hungarians, and that Hungarian culture and the use of the Hungarian language are seeking primarily to hamper the new government in its plans and thus prevent Roumania from really making Transylvania a part of the Roumanian nation. The struggle therefore is between the nationalities. According to the Treaty, religious liberty and the free use of language are granted to all people inside these various nations, therefore, if the Reformed faith is to be saved in Transylvania, the members of these churches must be helped from without.

THERE is need for funds to be sent in so that the ministers can be paid an adequate salary, and also that the schools may be reopened and maintained as effective agencies in the life of the people. There is need immediately for a theological college to be established in Kolozsvár to take the place of an institute that has become a part of the Roumanian government. The Unitarians also need help to reopen their theological school.

The re-establishment of these theological schools would exercise a profound and beneficial influence upon the Protestant population of this new Roumanian territory through their work in providing trained Christian leaders for the congregations. Their change of control or closing has been a severe blow to the churches, but one which they are determined to remedy at the earliest possible opportunity. The case, however, presents problems which are quite distinct from the important problem of financing the activities of the schools.

First of all, in order that we may be sure that the help given may be used in the proper way for use in the legitimate work of the churches and in the schools, it is absolutely essential that the Reformed churches of Transylvania declare their independence from the Conventus at Budapest and establish at Kolozsvár a new governing body which will have jurisdiction over the Transylvanian churches. This is the primary requisite, for with the close union which at present exists between the church and the state it is impossible even to discuss the religious wrongs apart from the political wrongs. Those in Transylvania most interested in securing freedom and efficiency for the churches are the same ones who are seeking to embarrass the Roumanian government and again secure a united Hungary with all its parts joined together as it was before the war.

If such a separation as has been here suggested can be secured and an independent Transylvanian church is set up, then the churches of America should join with the churches of the Allied countries in demanding for this Transylvanian church ecclesiastical and educational autonomy, and absolute freedom to maintain and direct international intercourse with Christians of any nationality or description, in all lands. The church should be allowed the free right to train its own ministers, teachers and workers.

In other words, unless Christian faith, according to Western types of worship is to be utterly destroyed in Transylvania, the churches of the world must bring pressure to bear upon the League of Nations to the end that justice may be secured and the rights guaranteed under the minority treaty and the Trianon Treaty be fully and freely granted.

CHAPTER VIII

A Delightful New Serial

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Illustrated by Anne Brockman

AS THE days crept into weeks, Rose-Marie no longer felt the dull unrest of inaction. She was busy at the Settlement House—her clubs for mothers and young girls, her kindergarten for the little tots, had grown amazingly popular. And, at those times when she was not busy at the Settlement House, she had the Volsky family and their many problems to occupy her.

The Volsky family—and their many problems! Rose-Marie would have found it hard to tell which problem was the most important! Of course Lily came first—her infirmities and her sweetness made her the central figure. But the problem of Ella was a more vital one to watch; it was, somehow, more immediate. Rose-Marie had found it hard to reach Ella. Except when Lily was the topic of conversation, except when Lily's welfare was to be considered, she stayed silently in the background. But the flashings of her great, dark eyes, the quiverings of her too scarlet mouth, were ominous.

Rose-Marie could see that the untidiness of the flat, the drunken mutterings of Pa, and her mother's filthy apron had strained Ella's resistance to the breaking point. Some day there would be a crash and, upon that day Ella would disappear like a gorgeous butterfly that drifts across the road, and out of sight. Rose-Marie was hoping to push that day into the background—to make it only a dim uncertainty rather than the sword of Democles that it was. But she could only hope.

Bennie, too, was a problem. But it was Bennie who cheered Rose-Marie when she felt that her efforts in behalf of Ella were failing. For Bennie's brain was the fertile ground in which she could plant ideals, and dreams. Bennie was young enough to change, and easily. He got into the way of waiting for her, after his school had been dismissed, in the little park. And there, seated close together on an iron bench, they would talk, and Rose-Marie would tell endless stories. Most of the stories were about knights who rode upon gallant quests, and about old time courtesy, and about wonderful animals. But sometimes she told him of her home in the country—of apple trees in bloom, and frail arbutus hiding under the snow. She told him of coasting parties, and bonfires, and trees to climb. And he listened, star-eyed and adoring. They made a pretty picture together—the slim, rosy-cheeked girl and the ragged little boy, with the pale city sunshine falling, like a mist, all about them.

LILY and Ella and Bennie—Rose-Marie loved them, all three. But Jim Volsky was the unsolvable problem—the one that she tried to push to the back of her mind, to avoid. Mrs. Volsky and Pa she gave up as nearly hopeless; she kept, as much as possible, out of Pa's way, and Mrs. Volsky could only be helped in the attaining of creature comforts—her spirit seemed dead! But Jim insisted upon intruding upon her moments in the flat; he monopolized conversations, and asked impertinent questions, and stared. More than once he had offered to "walk her home" as she was leaving; more than once he had thrust himself menacingly across her path. But she had managed, neatly, to avoid him.

Rose-Marie was afraid of Jim. She admitted it to herself—she even admitted, at times, that the Young Doctor might be of assistance if any emergency should arise out of Jim's sleek persistence. She had noticed, from the first, that the Young Doctor was an impressive man among men—she had seen the encouraging swell of muscles through the worn tweed of his coat sleeve. But to have asked his help in the controlling of Jim would have been an admission of deceit, of weakness, of failure. To prove her own theory that the people were real, underneath—to prove that they had sound morals and worth-while impulses—she had to make the reformation of the Volsky family her own individual task.

Yes—Rose-Marie was busy. Almost she hated to give up moments of her time to the letters she had to write home, to the sewing that she had to do. She made few friends among the teachers and visitors who thronged the Settlement House by day, and she was far too tired, when night came, to foregather with the Young Doctor and the Superintendent in the cosy little living-room. But often when her activities lasted well along into the evening, often when her clubs gave sociables or entertainments, she was forced to welcome the Young Doctor (the Superintendent was always welcome); to make room for him beside her own place.

IT WAS during one of these entertainments—her Girls' Sewing Society was giving a party—that she and the Young Doctor had their first real talk. Before the quarrel at the luncheon table they had had little time together. Since the quarrel the Young Doctor had seldom been able to corner Rose-Marie.

But at the entertainment they were placed, by the hand of circumstance, upon a wooden settee in the back of the room. And there, for the better part of two hours, while Katie Szrop declaimed poetry and Helen Merskovsky played upon the piano, and others recited long and monotonous dialogues, they were forced to stay.

The Young Doctor was in a chastened mood. He applauded heartily whenever a part of the program came to a close; the comments that he made behind his hand were neither sarcastic nor condescending. He praised the work that Rose-Marie had done and then, while she was glowing—almost against her will—from the warmth of that praise, he ventured a question.

"Are you ever sorry that you left the home town, Miss Rose-Marie?" he questioned.

Rose-Marie looked at him, for a moment, to see whether he was serious. And then, as no flicker of mirth stirred his mouth, she answered.

"Sometimes I'm homesick," she told him. "Usually after the lights are out, at night. But I'm never sorry!"

The Young Doctor was staring off into space—past the raised platform where the girls of the club were performing.

"I wonder," he said, after a moment, "I wonder if you can imagine what it is to have nothing in the world to be lonesome for, Mr. Marie?"

Rose-Marie felt a quick wave of sympathy toward the Young Doctor. "My mother and my father are dead, Dr. Blanchard," she told him softly. "But my aunts have always been splendid," she added honestly. "and I have any number of friends. No, I've never felt at all alone!"

THE Young Doctor was silent for a moment. A

then— "It isn't an alone feeling that I mean," he told her, "not exactly! It's rather an empty feeling—like hunger, almost. You see my father and mother are dead, too. I can't even remember them. And I never had any aunts to be splendid to me. My childhood—even my babyhood—was spent in an orphan asylum with a firm-fisted matron who punished me; with nobody to give me the love I needed. I came out of it a hard man—at fourteen. I—" he broke off, suddenly.

"I don't know why I'm telling you all this," he added, "you wouldn't be in the least interested in my school days—they were pretty drab! And you wouldn't be interested in the scholarship that gave me my profession. For," his tone changed slightly, "you aren't even interested in the result—not enough to try to understand my point of view when I attempt to tell you, frankly, just what I think of the people down here—barring girls like these," he pointed to the stage, "and a few others who are working hard to make good! You act, when I say that they're like animals, as if I'm giving you a personal insult! You think, when I suggest that you don't go, promiscuously, into dirty tenements, that I'm trying to curb your ambition—to spoil your chances of doing good."

"But I'm not, really. I'm only endeavoring, for your own protection, to give you the benefit of my rather bitter experience. I don't want any one so young, and trusting and—yes, beautiful—as you are to be forced, by experience, into my point of view. We love having you here, at the Settlement House. But I almost wish that you'd go home—back to the place and the people that you're lonesome for—after the lights are out!"

Rose-Marie, watching the play of expression across his keen dark face, was struck, first of all, by his sincerity. It was only after a moment that she began to feel the old resentment creeping back.

"Then," she said at last, very slowly, "then you think that I'm worthless, here? It seems to me that I could help the people more, just because I am fresh, and untried, and not in the least bitter! It seems to me that by direct contact with them I might be able to show them the tender, guiding hand of God—as it has always been revealed to me. But you think that I'm worthless!"

THERE was a burst of loud singing from the raised platform. The girls of the sewing club loved to sing. But neither Rose-Marie nor the Young Doctor was conscious of it.

"No," the Young Doctor answered, also very slowly, "no. I don't think that you are worthless—not at all. But I'm almost inclined to think that you're wasted. Go home, child; go home to the little town! Go home before the beautiful pink color has worn off the edge of your dreams!"

Again Rose-Marie felt the swift burst of anger that she had felt upon other occasions. Why did he persist in treating her like a child? But her voice was steady as she answered.

"Well," she told the Young Doctor, "I'm afraid that I'll have to disappoint you! For I came here with a definite plan to accomplish. And I'm going to stay here until it is at least partly accomplished!"

The Young Doctor was watching her flushed face. He answered almost regretfully.

"Then," he said, "I'm glad that you have a sweetheart—you didn't deny it, you know, the other night! He'll take you away from the slums, I reckon, before very long! He'll take you away before you've been hurt!"

Rose-Marie, looking straight ahead, did not answer. But the weight of deceit upon her soul made her feel very wicked.

CHAPTER IX

AS LILY pattered across the room, on her soft, almost noiseless little feet, Rose-Marie stopped talking. She had been having one of her rare conversations alone with Mrs. Volsky—a conversation that she had almost schemed for—and yet she stopped. It struck her suddenly as strange that Lily's presence in any place should make such a vast difference—that the child should bring with her a healing silence and a curious tenderness. She had felt, many times before, a slowing up in conversations—she had seen the bitterness drain from Ella's face, the stolidness from Bennie's. She had even seen Pa, from a room which Lily was entering. And now, as she watched, she saw a spark leap into the dullness of Mrs. Volsky's eyes.

With a gentle hand she reached out to the child, drew her close. Lily nestled against her side with a slight smile upon her faintly coral lips, with her blue, vacant gaze fixed upon space—or upon something that they could not see! Rose-Marie had often felt that Lily was watching beautiful vistas with those sightless eyes of hers; that she was hearing wonderful sounds with her useless little ears, sounds that normal people could not hear. But she did not say anything of the sort to Mrs. Volsky—Mrs. Volsky would not have been able to understand. Instead she spoke of something else that had lain, for a long time, upon her mind.

"Has Lily ever received any medical attention?" she asked abruptly.

Mrs. Volsky's face took on lines of blankness. "What say?" she mouthed thickly, "I don't understand."

Rose-Marie reconstructed her question. "Has Lily ever been taken to a doctor?" she asked.

MRS. VOLSKY answered more quickly than she usually answered questions.

"When she was first sick, years ago," she told Rose-Marie, "she had a doctor then. He say—no help for her. Las' year Ella, she took Lily by a free clinic. But the doctors, there, they say Lily never get no better. And now there comes another doctor to our door, but—" she shrugged; and her shrug seemed to indicate the uselessness of all doctors.

Rose-Marie, with suddenly misting eyes, lifted Lily to her knee. . . . "The only times," she said slowly, "when I feel any doubt in my mind of the Divine Plan—are the times when I see little children, who have never done anything at all wicked or wrong, bearing pain and suffering and . . ." she broke off.

Mrs. Volsky answered; as she almost always answered, with a mechanical question.

"What say?" she murmured dully.

Rose-Marie eyed her, over the top of Lily's golden head. After all, she told herself, in the case of Mrs. Volsky she could see the point of Dr. Blanchard's assertion! She had known many animals who appar-

What Has Gone Before

ROSE-MARIE, who has come from her sheltered, quiet home in the country to the Settlement House in the city's slums, clashes at the dinner table with the Young Doctor, an orphan who has had to fight for opportunity all his life. Imbued with a passion to make people better, while he avows as his aim a desire to make them healthier without regard to their souls. A student of the careful guard over her, sets out to show her associates some one. In a tiny park she interrupts a small boy in his torturing of a cat, rescues the animal, and wins the friendship of the lad by discovering the one spot of his heart—love of his younger sister Lily. She visits the Volsky home, without telling her associates at the Settlement House, and finds it more dirty and squalid than she had dreamed any home could be—the father in a drunken stupor; the mother dull and hopeless; Ella, the elder daughter, beautiful but hard; Jim, the elder son, with a nameless menace in his eyes. Lily, the only means through which Rose-Marie can arouse the family to better things, is blind, and deaf, and can not speak. Rose-Marie's absences when she is calling on the Volsky family are noticed by the Young Doctor, who jestingly accuses her of having a beau. Piqued over the distrust of her ability to accomplish something worth while, she allows him to retain that impression.

ently were quicker to reason, who apparently had more enthusiasm and ambition, than Mrs. Volsky. She looked at the dingy apron, the unkempt hair, the sagging flesh upon the gray-colored cheeks. And she was conscious suddenly of a feeling of revulsion. She fought it back savagely.

"Christ," she told herself, "never turned away from people because they were dirty, or ugly, or stupid. Christ loved everybody—no matter how low they were. He would have loved Mrs. Volsky . . ."

IT WAS curious how it gave her strength—that reflection—strength to look straight at the woman in front of her, and to smile.

"Why," she asked, and the smile became brighter as she asked it, "Why don't you try to fix your hair more neatly, Mrs. Volsky? And why don't you wear clean aprons, and keep the flat neater? Why don't you try to make your children's home more pleasant for them?"

Mrs. Volsky did not resent the suggestion as some other women might have resented it. Mrs. Volsky had reached the point where she no longer resented even blows.

"I uster try—onet," she said tonelessly, "but it ain't no good, no more. Ella an' Bennie an' Jim don' whenever he comes inter it. At . . . use?"

It was a surprisingly long speech for Mrs. Volsky. And some of it showed a certain reasoning power. Rose-Marie told herself, in all fairness, that if she were Mrs. Volsky, she, too, might be inclined to murmur desperately, "What's th' use?" She leaned forward, searching her mind for something to say.

"Do you like me, Mrs. Volsky?" she questioned at last. "Do you like me?"

THE woman nodded, and again the suggestion of a light flamed up in her eyes.

"Sure I like you," she said, "you are good to all of us—an' to Lily."

"Then," Rose-Marie's voice was quivering with eagerness, "then won't you try—for my sake—to make things here," the sweep of her hand included every corner of the ugly room, "a little better? I'll help you, very gladly. I'll make new aprons and I'll—" her brave resolution faltered, but only for a moment, "I'll wash your hair, and take you to the free baths with me. And then," she had a sudden inspiration, "then Lily will love to touch you, you'll be so nice and clean! Then Lily will be glad that she has you for a mother!"

All at once the shell of stupidity had slipped from Mrs. Volsky's bent shoulders. All at once she was eager, breathlessly eager.

"Miss," she said, and one thin, dingy hand was laid appealingly upon Rose-Marie's dress, "miss, you can do wit' me as you wish to! If you t'ink dat my bein' clean will make Lily glad—" she made a sudden impetuous gesture with her hand—"den I will be clean! If you t'ink dat she will like better dat I should be her mother," the word, on her lips, was surprisingly sweet, "den I will do—anything!" All at once she broke into words that were foreign to Rose-Marie, words spoken lovingly in some almost forgotten tongue.

Rose-Marie, listening to her, felt a sudden desire to kneel there, on the dirty tenement floor, and say a little prayer of thanksgiving. Once again she had proved that she was right—and that the Young Doctor was wrong.

Making Sunday the Best Day of All

How the Children of One Family Were Interested

By UTHAI VINCENT WILCOX

THOUSANDS of mothers, and fathers too, in endeavoring to maintain the sanctity of the Sabbath, are seeking to restrain and repress their children on Sunday, thus making it a day of dread. Such a course is likely to engender a deep-seated dislike for religion, when the parents ought to make Sunday a delight by having something that growing boys and girls can do that will be interesting and at the same time beneficial and in harmony with the fundamental and God-given plan for the sacred day.

One mother after thinking over the problem for a time, studying the Scriptures that relate to the observance of the day and noting the passage in Isaiah 58:13, about "making the Sabbath a delight," formulated a successful plan.

The family was an average one. Father and mother were church members and preserved a form of reverence for the Sabbath and its keeping as they had been taught to believe. There was a "form of godliness."

The plan that was chosen made the Sabbath a day that was looked forward to with delight by each member of the family. The day became a favorite. It increased the love of religion and the Bible, it made better boys and girls by giving all something to do.

The tasks of the day were reduced to a minimum. All the cooking possible was done on the day previous. After Bible School and the church service, dinner was had not later than 1 o'clock, and while the dishes and things were cleared away father took the nap that was to him as the breath of life.

Then there was an afternoon out of doors. The family went for a tramp to the woods, to a lake, to a river, or to visit some construction going on nearby; or it was merely a hike down the long road. "Best" clothes were discarded for that which would make the walk pleasant and easy.

The hikes were not meaningless either.

ONE week, according to the season and the weather it would be a hunt for some kind of tree or flower, moss or odd stones. Another time it would be a study of buildings, architecture; of houses, windmills; of balance and design in the laying out of the yard and the surroundings of the house.

As they walked they talked about God in nature and His great power; the intellect and ability that men have in making use of their God-given faculties to make the world better to live in. It seemed to be this family's key-note to look on the positive side of everything, to emphasize the best rather than to dwell on the bad.

When the weather prevented going out of doors, interesting times always were planned for inside. They would play what they called their "suggestion game."

For instance, a leaf might be suggested as a thing to talk about. Someone would mention, perhaps, the fig-leaf. That would suggest the beginning of dress and Eve's first garment. Mention would then be made of Joseph's coat of many colors, the white raiment of the angel visitors, the robes of the priests the Babylonish garments, the gorgeous apparel of King Solomon, the strange attire that was prohibited, with its "round tires like the moon," and its "crisp-pins"; the camels hair of John the Baptist; the seamless coat of Mary, the mother of Jesus, and so on.

There was no end to the interesting discussion and suggestions; the broad fields of knowledge and of history and the sciences that was open to the family.

There was never any attempt made to hold the talk to hard and fast lines. Humor and witty comments always were permitted. The suggestions were not to be sermons or preachments. The only rule was that the suggestion itself should originate from the Bible. The Bible came to be held in higher esteem when its vast storehouse of knowledge was understood better. The parents rightly felt that in using the Bible as the starting point there would be little danger of going wrong.

By the help of a concordance new subjects were injected into the talks; there was never any lack of variety. There were housekeeping topics, chariots of war, trees, plants, geology, and all the sciences, precious stones, rivers, seas, sun, rain, and animals.

Besides such games, there were stories read aloud, of the thrilling experiences of missionary life. Then there was the simple, yet entertaining card games of the question-and-answer type, featuring Bible characters. This was oftentimes used.

BUT it is the walks that are most enjoyed by any normal family. On Sabbath the car can well be left behind. Walking will provide just as interesting times as will the drive at a high rate of speed.

Another family where the children are younger go for the Sabbath day's walk in every kind of weather when it is at all possible to be out of doors. Some new place of interest is chosen each week. The neighbors' children are oftentimes invited to go along. This not only shows the watchful parent what kind of children their own are associating with, but it soon shows how their boys and girls act when with others.

Here are a few "stunts" that were indulged in by this family on their Sabbath afternoon walks:

All would be ordered to stand still for a few moments with eyes shut and told to listen intently, then tell what was heard.

Another time and at another place all would look intently in all directions, close their eyes and tell what was seen.

Someone would ask another to name objects such as seeds, flowers, twigs, etc., by touch, and with the eyes closed.

A certain kind of tree would be hunted. All the maple trees, then all the pepper trees, and other trees, according to the walk and the country.

For adding human interest to a ride when going farther away, all would be requested to pick out the houses as they were passed and tell which ones were the homes of children. This would mean careful observance of the front and back yard; the clothes-lines, the toys left about and the general condition of the property.

A walk by moonlight or at sunrise is of interest to everyone and will reveal many new things that most families never appreciate or even behold. It will help greatly in developing the sense of beauty in nature.

Such occupations as were used by these families make the Sabbath the key day of the week. It quickly becomes the best day of all. Father, mother and each child obtains something of help and benefit and real enjoyment out of the day. It is truly a day of delight.

Children of such families will soon think more of the church and of religion and gain a greater respect for the Bible after several afternoons talking over its varied contents.

One of the fathers after discussing the keeping of the Sabbath in the new style, remarked: "It is rather a busy day, but it's ever so much better than attempting to make the children 'keep quiet.'" It is quite needless to say that his wife most heartily agreed with him.

Breaking the Silence

PRESIDENT-ELECT HARDING has taken counsel since his return from Panama, with a view to forming definite conclusions on the overshadowing question of world peace. Of course, it goes without saying that he is favorable to any measure that may appeal to him as both wise and practicable for attaining that object. He has repeatedly declared that he has an open mind. All his statements in this connection carry the conviction that he is thoroughly conscientious in his desire to do what is best for the American people. During these conferences, he has met leading men of different political parties, and while none of these will disclose what has taken place, enough is known to show that he appreciates the fact that this nation is looking to him, and trusting him, to do all that may lie within his power when he assumes office, to bring about such conditions as will open the way for the United States to assume its proper rôle as leader in the world-peace movement.

It may be that this will ultimately be accomplished in some manner not yet apparent, or possibly through such modifications in the League of Nations as will make that organization a basis for our co-operation. There is, however, one point of paramount importance, on which Mr. Harding has already declared himself. At a gathering of the Marion Presbytery, held in a church in that city, Senator Harding and Mr. Bryan spoke from the same platform. The President-elect, as reported in the New York Times of December 20 and other newspapers, said:

"I know how you were aroused to a great ideal of world relations, and how unhappy many of you were that we all could not see it that way. But you did not stop to think that in the conception of Versailles there was no recognition of God Almighty. I could not hope for a very happy relationship among nations unless there was a common thought among them in recognition of a Supreme Being.

In the light of such a declaration, surely we may infer the purport of Senator Harding's attitude in his conferences during the last weeks in December. At the time of the formation of the Peace League, and the framing of the Treaty at Versailles, there was no record of any recognition, either in prayer, resolution, or address, of the Supreme Power of the Universe. The Christian Herald pleaded that God should be placed in the covenant, that the divine rulership should be reverently acknowledged, and that the convention should appeal for wisdom from the only Source whence wisdom can come. Other religious publications probably took the same view. So far as we have read and heard of the proceedings at Versailles, no such recognition was accorded, and it was the same in the Geneva session of the League Assembly. To sincere Christian minds this was an inexplicable omission. A reverent declaration would have received the approval of the Christian people of all lands.

Mr. Harding has done well in speaking out clearly as he did. He has broken the silence, and what he has said may go very far toward explaining the indifference that has been manifested in many quarters. To remake the world, leaving God out of the reckoning, is a task humanly impossible. Our national traditions and the desire of our people lead us to look for such recognition.

Population and Immigration

ACCORDING to the official figures of the Census Bureau, which has just completed its revision of the statistics issued in earlier bulletins some time ago, the population of continental United States today is shown to be 105,708,771, and of our outlying possessions 12,148,738, a total of 117,857,509. Almost every nationality under the sun is represented in this vast aggregate. It was anticipated that the war would retard the growth of our population, as it called away hundreds of thousands of able-bodied men who went to fight under their own national standards; but the return wave has already brought back a very large proportion of them. And news comes that millions more, from almost every country in Europe and the Near East, are planning to make the United States their home in the near future.

This vast impending immigration brings us face to face with a grave economic problem. In the House of Representatives a measure restricting immigration for a period of one year has been under discussion, but it has not yet been considered in the Senate. It is urged in its support, that while the D.

Co-operation That Counts

By GRAHAM PATTERSON

THE co-operative effort of good people-working together to accomplish a given task is like an avalanche in its irresistible power. The biggest and most dangerous obstacles are uprooted and passed over—nothing can stop them.

Christian Herald readers know from years of association in world relief and Christian work how this influence has been made international. What stronger proof of this could we have than the present China Famine appeal. Your prayers for, and generosity to, starving China awoke America to the need of a nation-wide fund. President Wilson heard your call and appointed a national committee.

With your help funds will be raised which will go far toward saving millions of lives. We may well be happy to have played such a part, but who can tell the final result of it all? Where will the much-talked-of and greatly feared "yellow peril" be, do you suppose, in the face of this sort of sympathetic and friendly spirit? Our new kind of avalanche will smother it in its brotherly arms!

And is it too much to expect that those who look upon America as a nation that has never failed them, and Americans as their friends, will come to love our Saviour and live by His guidance?

founders of our government encouraged immigration of the desirable kind, which would assist in up-building what was then a comparatively new territory, they had no problems in sight such as those we now have to face. The effect of the wholesale influx of immigrants of all classes, including the feeble, the criminal, the pauper, the ignorant and untrained, and the politically unassimilable, as well as the thrifty, the able-bodied and the law-abiding, is something that demands serious consideration. While America should still hold an open door and extend a hearty welcome to the really desirable, to admit all-comers from the old world unquestioningly would be to invite not only regrets but serious trouble, which a wise and judicious course now would go far to avert. Politicians, who unfortunately do not always represent the best ideals or safeguard the highest interests of the nation, may take the opposite view; but caution is the soundest policy as well as the safest. Restriction, on the other hand, can be relaxed when experience justifies such a course.

The Growth of Co-operation

AS the World War recedes and as observers begin to secure a perspective on this struggle, some are asking this question:

Has the world been taught any lesson which it is using to the betterment of industry, of society?

Perhaps it is too early to draw any conclusions, but even in the present period of readjustment, certain movements for good are beginning to take form.

One of these movements is resolving itself into a growth in economic co-operation, in the banding together of formerly distinct groups for the better performances of certain functions.

Industries (as in the case of a Chicago public service company) are calling employees into partnership and participation.

Employees (as in the case of a Cincinnati textile plant) are coming into relationships where they share the responsibilities and cares of the management.

Businesses are extending their ownership to customers and clients.

Nearly everywhere one looks, is seen a tendency to assure greater stability and dependability in institutions through the transfer of common interest from the few to the many.

Not all this, however, is peculiar to the present day. Pioneers in many fields took steps in the direction of greater co-operation long before the war. All that the war did was to increase the speed of the movement that looked toward that most essential thing of increased social co-operation.

Significant of this present tendency is a plan now being carried to completion by the Christian Herald—a plan of co-operation which, by the way, had its inception in the mind of Dr. Klopsch years ago, but was interrupted at that time by his death.

The plan is one which had been urged by friends of the Christian Herald to the end of an extension of ownership of the magazine to a limited number of interested subscribers. Many readers who had been with the publication long enough to feel a warm personal interest in it, had in a very considerable manner contributed to its success, told the management that such a step would be economic and in harmony with present tendencies.

In the spirit of sound pioneering, which has always guided the Christian Herald and kept it at the head of religious journalism, a plan was worked out and placed before a limited number of subscribers, whose advice and suggestions were asked.

It is interesting to observe that all of the replies were favorable to the plan and that the principle of co-operation proposed received approval by these long-time friends of the Christian Herald.

So far as the Christian Herald is concerned, the object of the movement is to admit to membership in the corporation a limited number of subscriber-stockholders and to give them, first, the opportunity of financial participation; and second, the privilege of advisory counsel.

In common with co-operative plans carried out by other institutions, it is felt that this plan will mean much to the development and continued progress of the institution, and it is the belief of the editors that the movement is so significant as to deserve editorial comment.

Good Roads vs. Unemployment

GOOD roads, it has been asserted, hold the solution to the unemployment situation. This seems an extravagant statement until you study the matter a little. It has been abundantly proved that a good road pays for itself many times over. Money spent on making bad roads good, has always proved itself a strikingly good investment.

There are in every community in the United States, many bad roads which should be made over into good thoroughfares. These bad, unprofitable roads total many thousands of miles, and are disgraceful blots upon the fair and attractive face of the progressive land we live in. If every community in the United States would begin simultaneously to repair and rebuild its bad roads, jobs would be provided for every unemployed laborer in the United States—directly or indirectly. The smallest item would be the tens of thousands of laborers directly employed in building the roads themselves. Railroads, instead of having an increasing number of surplus cars and light trains of freight, would be able to employ every car they own, and to run their trains at maximum capacity. Instead of releasing thousands of men from steady employment, they would keep them at full time, and call back the thousands already released. Cement, stone and other road-building material plants would be kept crowded to capacity operations, with work for thousands more men, instead of laying them off. And so it would go on.

But the good would not stop with the industries directly related to road-building. The men employed in road-building in your town, the railroad men, the building material men, and others, being actively employed would buy more clothes, more shoes, more good—more of everything that the normal American family buys and uses when its circumstances are comfortable. Each of our hundreds of industries would thus be given new work to do, with active employment for many thousands of workers. Each employed worker, in turn, means a little more employment for scores of other workers. And so things grow by geometrical progression, and ultimately you have active employment for everybody in the whole country.

There are a hundred and seven million people in the United States to be constantly housed, clothed, fed and otherwise provided for. The present depression in business is not fundamental; it is due only to inflated and artificial conditions, and therefore temporary. Nothing will contribute more to permanent prosperity than permanent good roads wherever good roads should be. The time to build these roads is now. Building them promptly means not only a definitely bigger permanent prosperity, but an immediate turn from present depression to present activity and prosperity.

The World News of the Week

Senator Harding's World Peace Plan Now Taking Shape

SENATOR HARDING'S conferences at Marion with prominent Republican leaders have resulted in the formulation of a tentative program for dealing with the problems confronting his administration, and a world peace plan based on the united moral influence of the great Powers has taken somewhat definite shape.

This plan contemplates a diplomatic exchange with Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan soon after his inauguration, asking that they consider the possibilities of an agreement between them and the United States to exert a united moral force for world peace. This proposal would not involve a political alliance, but probably would reaffirm the faith of America in a world court in which all nations might voluntarily become litigants. The next step would depend upon the replies of the powers, which Mr. Harding believes would be favorable and might lead to a conference, at which would be determined such questions as the availability of the Hague tribunal and workable features of the present League of Nations in creating a new covenant.

Mr. Harding has not definitely committed himself to any program, and the details still are to be worked out, but the conferences have brought many valuable suggestions and the president-elect viewed the progress already made as surging success.

From what it terms "authoritative sources," the New York Times presented an outline of the principles upon which Mr. Harding was working in connection with a modified association of nations. The theory of international relationship which he laid before his conferees was outlined in part as follows: The Times:

"1. No association of nations can succeed without endorsement of the leaders of public thought. It applies to other countries as well as the United States.

"2. In reaching these leaders the discussion must relate not to details but to broad, general principles.

"3. Theories of international relationships throughout their discussion must be kept in a state capable of change as various opinions are encountered and consideration of the matter progresses.

"4. Elimination of all governing features in an association of nations. Each nation shall remain free to make its own decisions.

"5. Construction of an international relationship based on the world court idea, deciding justiciable questions only, but co-ordinated with an association of nations for conference on matters relating to general policy.

"6. Confining the first approach in the formation of an association of nations to an effort to obtain the assent of the influential powers, it is apparently Senator Harding's belief that aside from their military power, the five moral leaders of the world today are the United States, Great Britain, France, Japan and Italy.

"7. Once agreement of the five leading powers is obtained, the other nations will fall in line.

"8. In obtaining the approval of the influential powers, care must be taken that the agreement shall be specific enough not to afford a possibility of an offensive and defensive military alliance of the five great world powers, and the association of nations itself must place all nations on an equal footing in the presentation of their views on matters of world policy."

The selection of his cabinet apparently was taking second place in Mr. Harding's mind, and there was no indication that a single definite selection had been made. He denied that Charles E. Hughes had been chosen Secretary of State, and had accepted, but Mr. Hughes remained in the forefront of discussion for this or some other cabinet post. Senator Knox also was considered a strong possibility. It was expected that Mr. Harding would announce in a short time his selections for the State and Treasury portfolios, in order that policies for those important departments may be formulated in advance.

House Passes Tariff Bill

AN EMERGENCY bill designed to aid American farming interests through the imposition of a high protective duty on agricultural products has been passed in the House of Representatives by a vote of 196 to 86. Party lines were ignored on the measure, and forty-one Democrats voted for it, while fourteen Republicans opposed it.

Among the customs duties carried in the bill, which would be effective for ten months, were the following: Wheat, 30 cents a bushel; corn, 15 cents a bushel; potatoes 25 cents a bushel; onions, 40 cents a bushel; cattle, 30 per cent. ad valorem; sheep, $1 and $2 a head; and long staple cotton, 7 cents a pound.

The schedules fixed by the Ways and Means Committee were passed without change, although numerous amendments were offered, and only three hours were consumed in general debate. Despite the haste with which the measure was rushed through the House, there was no expectation that it would be acted upon favorably in the Senate, as some speakers admitted during the debate, and it was predicted the bill would be pigeon-holed by the Senate Finance Committee.

Representative Fordney, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, expressed the hope that the special session to be called by Mr. Harding soon after his inauguration would pass a protective tariff bill with schedules as high as those of the Payne or Dingley acts, to serve as a relief measure until permanent tariff legislation could be enacted.

Bishop Charles S. Burch Dies

BISHOP CHARLES SUMNER BURCH, of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York, died suddenly in New York, at the age of 65, as the result of an attack of heart disease. He had been in failing health for some time, but had been able to continue his duties. A little while before his death he had started out alone for a walk along Riverside Drive, but had not gone far before he felt himself growing weaker, and was barely able to reach the home of a friend, where he died.

Bishop Burch had held office only fifteen months, having been elected in September, 1919, to succeed the late Bishop David H. Greer, under whom he had served for eight years as Suffragan Bishop. He was not ordained until he was fifty years old, although his ambition as a young man had been to enter the ministry. His earlier years, after his graduation from the University of Michigan, were spent in business and in journalistic pursuits and he served for nine years as editor and manager of the Grand Rapids Evening Press. His activity in home missionary work after he became a clergyman soon drew attention to him, and his rise was rapid.

Among his most important tasks as Bishop was that of pushing the construction of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, and contracts were let for the beginning of work on the Cathedral nave next spring.

National Lutheran Council Meets

THE National Lutheran Council, a federation of nine general Lutheran bodies in America, with a baptized membership of 2,115,000 served by 5,647 ministers, held its second annual convention in Chicago the second week of December. Its activities for 1920 were reported by Dr. Lauritz Larsen, General Secretary, who included the report of the European Commissioner, Dr. John A. Morehead of Copenhagen.

Realizing that the war had greatly affected the Lutheran churches of Europe the Council was organized in 1918 and commissioners sent to France. The following year a commission was sent to the other countries of Europe suffering from the war, and now every region where the Lutheran Church is established has received some assistance. When Russia is open for the Church's work of relief and counsel, reconstruction work in that country will be undertaken.

Clothing, food, and literature, especially Bibles, have been sent in large quantities to Europe.

The Council also decided to inaugurate a worthy celebration of the quadricentenary of the Diet of Worms, where Luther was the central figure, which will culminate in April of next year.

Perhaps the most significant action was to instruct the Executive Committee to arrange for a world conference of Lutherans in 1922. Lutherans the world over number 81,500,000 souls, with 41,689 pastors, and the war has raised numerous problems which can only be satisfactorily discussed in a large representative conference.

The Council has been created to serve as a medium of co-operation for its constituent bodies in practical church work. Its officers are: President, Dr. Lauritz Larsen, New York; Vice-president, Dr. C. H. L. Schuette, Columbus, Ohio; Secretary, Rev. Peter Peterson, Chicago; Treasurer, E. F. Eilert, New York; Financial Secretary, Rev. G. L. Kieffer, New York.

Marines Cleared in Haitian Inquiry

THE Naval Court of Inquiry, after several weeks of investigation of Haitian affairs, has presented a report warmly commending the work of the Marine Corps in Haiti and declaring that where "unjustifiable homicides" were committed the cases were isolated and due to individuals who were subjected to disciplinary action. The Court found that there were no proper grounds for the charges by Brigadier-General George Barnett, formerly commandant of the Marine Corps, that "practically indiscriminate killings of natives had been going on for some time," and in effect censured General Barnett for his statements regarding the situation.

The report emphasized the fact that for the first time in more than a hundred years tranquility and security of life and property may be said to prevail in Haiti, and declared that in bringing about such conditions the Marines had performed an arduous and dangerous and thankless task with "fidelity and great gallantry." The officers in particular were commended for their "sympathetic attitude toward every step that would lead to the betterment of the country and improvement in the mental, physical and moral conditions of the population." The court reported two unjustifiable homicides and sixteen other serious acts of violence, but found no evidence of other serious crimes against the citizens of Haiti; and in view of the fact that court-martials had meted out punishment, it made no further report upon the question of responsibility.

This investigation concerned itself only with the

China Famine Relief Moving Rapidly

RELIEF measures for the tens of millions of starving humanity in China are being pushed as rapidly as possible, and already the sufferings of some are being alleviated through the generosity of America. But the aid extended thus far has been only the barest beginning—only a few of the vast number affected have been helped as yet—and the great work of relief lies in the future.

It was in November that the Christian Herald told the Family Circle of the great disaster which has overwhelmed five provinces of North China, where 45,000,000 of Chinese are face to face with starvation and the long, cold, northern winter has only begun. A cable message from Rev. Z. C. Beals has brought news that 10,000 are dying daily, but that the Christian Herald Committee has begun its work. Other agencies have been at work, and the task of alleviating the sufferings of the Chinese is going forward.

The American Committee for China Famine Relief, consisting of 130 prominent men and women, with Mr. Thomas W. Lamont as its chairman, Mr. Norman Davis, Under-Secretary of State, honorary treasurer, Mr. Rae D. Henkle, managing editor of the Christian Herald, General Secretary, and Mr. Vernon Munroe, of J. P. Morgan and Co., treasurer, has launched out on the task of organizing a nation-wide appeal for funds to meet the tremendous emergency. It has constituted an Executive Committee, of which Mr. Union N. Bethell, formerly president of the New York Telephone Company and a director in many other large corporations, is chairman. Mr. Graham Patterson, publisher of the Christian Herald, is vice chairman of this committee. The other members of the Executive Committee are: Dr. Robert E. Speer, New York; Rev. Dr. Frank Mason North, New York; Raymond Fosdick, New York; John P. Jones, New York; H. T. S. Greene, New York; Wm. H. Taft, New Haven, Conn.; Adolph S. Ochs, New York; Dr. Livingston Farrand, Washington, D. C.; George Horace Lorimer, Philadelphia, Pa.; Galen L. Stone, Boston, Mass.; John Jay Abbott, Chicago, Ill.; Festus J. Wade, St. Louis, Mo.; Robert Dollar, San Francisco, Cal.; Mortimer L. Schiff, New York; Arthur B. Parker, New Orleans, La.

ON December 20, Charles R. Crane, the American Minister, cabled from China to the State Department as follows:

"Famine area includes large part of Chili, Shantung, and Honan that are north of Yellow River and south of a line from Taoting-su-po to Tientsin, with large sections of Shansi, Shensi and west Honan. After months of careful investigation, the reports of American missionary and business men in these areas show at least 15 million people to be seriously affected, the large majority of whom are now living on diet composed one-half of leaves, wild plants and bark. Hundreds of thousands have fled from area.

"Death from starvation is beginning. The death rate will rise rapidly and a large typhus epidemic seems inevitable. Relief must be carried on until the June harvest. Americans are united with the Chinese and other nationals in six reliable relief committees, dividing the field, in addition to the American Red Cross working west from Shantung. There is fine co-operation of all nations and all churches. Railway facilities in north China now are used almost exclusively for the transportation of coal and other transportation of relief supplies. Military use is at a minimum. $1.00 a month will take care of one patient. Present available fund at the disposal of committee—three millions.

"Chinese Government Relief Bureau expects to raise fifteen millions. These funds, with the contributions of small societies, will provide for not more than four million people. American Red Cross relief, based on construction of public works, is rapidly expanding and will ultimately reach a hundred thousand people. The system is conducted almost entirely by volunteers and is capable of indefinite expansion. Practically all money raised for this purpose reaches the actual sufferers. American directors, engineers and soldiers are in charge of the Red Cross operations. Sufficient food is available in Manchuria. The situation requires the generous and immediate support of the American people and the rest of the world. Funds best sent through International Famine Relief, Peking."

THIS is the message that comes to us from the American Minister on the ground—"Chinese Government Relief Bureau expects to raise fifteen millions. These funds, with contributions of small societies, will provide for not more than four million people!"

And forty-five millions are in need! The number is so vast as to be almost incomprehensible; but those suffering millions are there, and in dire distress.

If every male, man and child, in the United States were to die today, their number would be about that of the Chinese in the famine area.

If every city and town in this country with a population of more than 2,500 were to be wiped out by some vast calamity, the death list would be little greater than the number threatened in Northern China.

There are in this country some two million, five hundred thousand miles of public roads. If these Chinese could be brought here and carried to all parts of the land, there would be one lying every two hundred and fifty feet at the side of every public road, from the Atlantic Coast to the Pacific and from Canada to the Mexican border!

It is only by such pictures as these that the numbers in the famine area can be visualized.

What a wave of compassion and help would rise if

1,450,000. Even China, where uncounted millions are born to live on the sharp edge of want, has never felt the cold hand of hunger as she does today. The Chinese famine of 1878 cost the lives of nine and a half millions of men and women and children. For each of these, four are in danger now.

They have begun to die at the rate of ten thousand a day, and winter has scarcely begun. One dollar will save a life for a month, according to Minister Crane's estimate. A dollar is not much. But there are 45,000,000 Chinese.

Help, immediate help, on a vast scale must go to them from this country. The Chinese Government is doing what it can, and other countries will give. But it is to the United States that the famine victims are looking. We are the richest, best able to aid, and for many years China has given her confidence and faith to America beyond other nations. American missionaries have done a noble work in China, and have laid the foundations of this enduring friendship.

IT IS just twenty years ago that, at the end of the Boxer Rebellion and the Siege of Peking, President Roosevelt remitted to China her indemnity to us. This sum of fifteen million dollars was to be used by China for the education of her young men. Many of them have come to this country to learn the ways and customs of their Western friends. How this friendship has grown and taken root is indicated in a letter just received by the Christian Herald from a Chinese student in Columbia University:

"To the Editor of the Christian Herald:

"One of the most popular proverbs in China is this: 'If you have received from any person the favor of a little drop of water, afterwards, in expressing your gratitude, you must offer your fountain to him.' I do not know how those 40,000,000 starving souls in the northern part of China will be able to offer their fountains to the generous American public; yet I am sure that they and their children and their grandchildren and their great-grand-children will never forget what you have done for them now.

"Besides, I believe this is a wonderful opportunity for you to demonstrate once again to the Chinese public the true Christ-like spirit of universal brotherhood, for which many American missionaries have dedicated their lives to China.

"In conclusion, may I offer you my heartfelt thanks for your splendid efforts on behalf of my country-people?"

(Signed) "C. C. Lu."

A letter like this, full of spontaneous and heartfelt gratitude, means much, and can but be an added stimulus to even greater effort.

THE Christian Herald Fund, from a grand total of $109,714.07, (corrected) in our issue of January 1, has grown swiftly. Contributions are coming in steadily, thus:

This is a magnificent start, and there are many ways in which help can be given. Christian Herald readers are sending in Liberty bonds; they are asking their churches and Sunday schools to take up collections.

The American Committee for China Famine Fund is nation-wide in its scope. We, of the Christian Herald, are working in closest co-operation with it for the great need that has arisen on the other side of the world.

One dollar will save a life for a month.

The Christian Herald will receive donations of money or Liberty bonds. Send contributions to the Christian Herald, China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City.

AMERICA'S Christmas dinner cost approximately $250,000,000, according to figures based on government statistics, statements of food authorities and the average price of the various luxuries that go to make the Yuletide feast as quoted in the retail markets.

What America spent on her Christmas dinner would buy almost 8,500,000,000 pounds of rice, or enough to make 6,800,000,000 Chinese meals, these figures based on the quantity of rice required daily to keep a Chinese in food, as given by medical authorities every one in America could be clearly shown what the Chinese famine really means. Distance does not lessen their need for our help.

Christian Herald readers are doing much, and the Family Circle may have a just pride in what has been accomplished. But the work has only started.

GREAT disasters of the past come down to us in history, but the recorded memory of mankind has nothing comparable to the distress and death in China today.

The World War, in four years, slew 7,500,000.

The Black Death in England, which has remained a horror for more than seven centuries, numbered its toll at two millions.

The terrible famines of the past do not even approach the present one. In Ireland, in 1846 and 1847, 1,009,000 people died. India, in 1866, lost

Exploring Anurajahpura's Glories

Ceylon's Metropolis Had Its Skyscraper 2100 Years Ago

By FRANCIS DICKIE

MEN built skyscrapers twenty-one hundred years ago! Surprising as it sounds, it nevertheless is true. One of these buildings, probably the greatest skyscraper of the past, was nine stories high, and stood in the city of Anurajahpura, perhaps the most wonderful of ancient Asiatic cities at the beginning of the Christian era, in its best days rivaling the glories of Nineveh and Babylon. A few of the remarkable features of this huge city have been revealed at last through the work of the British Colonial authorities and the Archaeological Society of Ceylon—but only a few, for the task of exploring these ruins is a gigantic

One of the rock temples near the ancient city of Anurajahpura, in Ceylon

A little idea of the full marvel of the city may be gained from the fact that though work has been pushed ahead with unflinching persistence for forty years by these modern reconstructors of the past, only some five miles in a circle has been cleared in Anurajahpura, and the buildings returned to a little of their pristine glory—only five miles in a city which covered an area of about 260 square miles.

It had four walls, each sixteen miles long. It was begun early in the third century B.C.; reached its height of glory about the fifth century after Christ, and flourished until 1164, then was deserted and became overrun with jungle in the next seven hundred and fifty years. Now, after these buildings have been standing for lengths of time, varying from two thousand to twenty-two hundred years, the best preserved of them are being reclaimed from the jungle by the British Colonial authorities and the Archaeological Society of Ceylon.

Fortunately for the men of today who are working in Ceylon on the ancient city, the people who founded it two thousand-odd years ago and those who came after them for a dozen centuries were favored with learning. From the third century B. C. till the city was deserted, countless learned teachers dwelt in Anurajahpura, and countless more students flocked from all parts of the country to imbibe their knowledge and carry it on to the next generation. Thus men of today by deciphering the writings of those ancient times have learned of the wonders of the past, one of the most interesting of which to the average man is probably the fact that the world had its skyscrapers two thousand-odd years ago.

ANURAJAHPURA was a stronghold of Buddhism, which was introduced in the third century before Christ by Prince Mahinda of India. According to legend, Prince Mahinda flew from India to Ceylon, alighting on a rock near the city of Anurajahpura and in sight of the king, who happened to be out hunting. King Tissa, the reigning monarch, at once became converted and made Mahinda his guest. The whole country soon was converted, one hundred thousand converts being made on one occasion in one day. Following this, great activity was begun in building monuments of Buddha, like the fifteen-foot-high one shown in the photograph in the center of the page. Some reached to the height of eighty feet. There was also reared a vast assortment of buildings in connection with the new religion—dagabas, or bell-shaped shrines, palaces and viharas or residences of the scholars.

The greatest priest house was the Brazen Palace, the ancient skyscraper, a nine-story structure. The description of this wonder is taken from records nearly two thousand years old, for of the upper part of the building nothing is standing. Its foundation consisted of sixteen hundred square stone pillars fifteen feet high and several feet thick, each hewn out of solid rock and transported from seventy-five to a hundred miles by tamed elephants. Its roof was of brass tiles and at sunset could be seen for many miles. The palace housed nine hundred monks, so each of the nine stories must have been of considerable size. The upright pillars are all that remain of this enormous structure, for in the twelfth century Cholyan invaders battered down the beautiful masonry and carried away the tiles of brass as valuable loot of war.

Next perhaps in interest is the fact that the men of those days captured wild elephants and tamed them and put them to toil. If they had not done this, they could never have accomplished the marvelous building feats which stand to their credit, for all of the enormous pillars supporting the Brazen Palace and millions of tons of other masonry had to be transported across seventy-five miles of country from the mountains.

AROUND [the Brazen Palace for several miles was reared a wondrous array of bell-shaped shrines or dagabas, ranging from a few feet in circumference to eleven hundred feet. Some of them had enough masonry in them to construct a small modern city. One of these which has been rehabilitated is the Dagaba Ruanveli built in the second century before Christ. The photograph at the bottom of the page shows its appearance today. It is dome-shaped and built of brick throughout, with no inner chamber so far as can be ascertained from research and from the ancient writings. It is surrounded by a stone-paved square walk upon which stood many smaller temples and shrines. Today, however, only four statues of Buddha, like the one shown, are on it.

The Dagaba is three hundred feet high, with a foundation of cement some twenty feet deep, and was originally coated with stucco and gilded from re-ment wall to pinnacle. Looking at it today from a short distance, with its great sides supporting a veritable forest, it is hard to believe that all this mighty structure is the work of man, one of many reared over a space of many miles which served no useful purpose. The brickwork has stood wonderfully the erosion of two thousand one hundred years.

Nearly, perhaps, a mile and a quarter distant is the Dalada Maligawa, where in the year A.D. 319 was enshrined the Great Buddha's tooth. As an example that credulity has always been common to human beings, it is worthy of note that thousands of Buddhists today make long journeys from Burmah, Siam and India to see this tooth, though some seven hundred years ago it was ground up into powder. According to the story, the city was besieged and in danger of capture, so the priests assigned to the care of the tooth, ground it up into powder, carried it to the sea, and threw the powder upon the water. About a year later when the invaders were driven away, the tradition asserts, the denizens of the sea gathered every particle of the tooth and returned it to the priests. The priests, aided by miraculous powers, reconstructed the tooth as it originally was. To those who may be skeptical of this story, the pious Buddhist points to the tooth in the temple of Kandy under the joint care of the Provincial Governor and the High Priest. In the vicinity of the Dalada Maligawa are scattered the remains of many wonderful residences, bathrooms and small temples. One of the rock temples is shown in the photograph at the top of the page, an examination of which gives a better idea of the style and wonders of this ancient architecture than pages of description could.

THE greatest of all the Dagabas is known as the Jetavanarama, built late in the third century after Christ. The building is 307 feet high with the high spire intact, for all the wars that have waged around it during sixteen hundred years. It contains, according to engineering estimates, twenty million cubic feet of brickwork. To rear this today would require the labor of 500 bricklayers working ten hours a day for seven years. With the material a wall a foot thick and four feet high could be erected from New York to Chicago. The jungle growth has been cleared from the stone steps but the rest of the great building is now all covered with vegetation, and more resembles a natural hill than the work of man.

Gazing upon this monster structure—a futile and needless thing since so far as can be learned it contains no inner chamber, one of many such buildings in the vicinity, each of which required the labor of tens of thousands of men over many years—the modern spectator stands appalled at this wasted labor; yet still cannot withhold admiration for the ability of these builders of the long ago.

This statue of Buddha probably was erected about the third century B. C. It is fifteen feet high

The Dagaba Ruanveli, three hundred feet high, is so huge it is hard to believe it was the work of man. It is of brick construction throughout

The Enduring Amidst the Changing

An Anniversary Sermon by Rev. FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.*

TEXT—Isa. 51:6. "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look on the earth beneath, for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke. And the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner, but my salvation shall be forever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished."

THE thought of the text and of this seventieth anniversary is the changeless and imperishable in a world of mutation and decay. Two churches like this in line would touch the hand of Washington, five of them would reach the Pilgrim Fathers, thirty would take the hand of Christ. When the church was organized the United States had a population of about thirty million, now there are over a hundred million. The church has witnessed the birth of the electric light, the telephone, the phonograph, wireless telegraphy, the automobile and the airplane.

At the time of its organization, slavery, which had cursed the world for six thousand years, existed in about every nation on the earth; now no country owns slaves. When this church began, alcohol, which had cursed the race from the beginning, was on the throne. Nearly everybody in this country drank intoxicants. Now the nation is dry.

This church has lived in the period of the greatest progress of Christ's Universal Kingdom since it was founded on the earth, more than doubling its population in the past seventy years. This church sent out a favorite child who became one of the best friends world-wide missions ever had, in the person of Bishop James N. Fitzgerald, who died as a martyr to his cause from a malignant disease in India while on a tour of Episcopal supervision.

This church was organized in 1849, and this building was dedicated on Thanksgiving Day in 1851 by Bishop Waugh. The pastors from the beginning have been Revs. D. P. Kidder, J. B. Wakeley, Wesley Kenny, L. R. Dunn, W. Tumsin, D. D. Love, R. L. Dashiell, J. K. Burr, R. R. Meredith, Alfred Cookman, G. S. Hare, Henry Spellmer (elected Bishop), W. V. Kelley; James Boyd Brady, F. C. Iglehart, J. R. Bryan, William H. Morgan (pastor 17 years), Harry Y. Murkland and the present pastor, B. F. Dickisson. Among these were a number who have had national standing and influence. The church gave to the ministry A. H. Tuttle, James N. Fitzgerald (Bishop), Boylen Fitzgerald and Charles Yatman, Evangelist, all true ministers of the Lord Jesus.

THE salvation to which the prophet referred is that of the immortal soul. "Dust thou art, to dust returnest Was not written of the soul."

It is the soul that breathes from canvas, that speaks from marble, that piles in architectural finish, that frightens with the sword, that soothes with poet's lyre; it is the soul that upheaves in mighty revolutions and settles in reforms; that builds institutions, cities, empires; that transforms the face of material into the useful arts; that tells for weal or woe upon individual and public destiny. It is the soul that makes us members of the family of spirit amenable to the spirit law, the royal love to God and fellows, that makes it possible for us to receive God into our life and love as a saving force. The new years chase the old ones into the fading past, but the flight of time cannot hurt the soul, cannot blight it with decay.

It is important that the Church should educate, that it should be a loving brotherhood, that it should be a fountain of benevolence to the community, but its primal function is to save souls; without this all else is emptiness, is failure. No matter how large the church building, or wealthy or cultivated the membership, no matter what spectacular display it may make, or what standing it may have, it is dead if it has no God power in it to save men. The real church grows like a tree by the development of the life within, not by the addition of cold masonry on the outside.

God has saved souls in this church through His revealed Word. Its preachers have not discredited it; they have not eliminated the Supernatural from it. Peter copied the thought of our text from Isaiah in these words:

"The glory of man is as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away. But the word of the Lord endureth forever. And this is the word which by the Gospel is preached unto you."

Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the soul, has been the center and circumference, the soul and the substance of this church. It has not picked Him to pieces by the fingers of doubt. It has believed in His miracles, His acts and sayings, in His Immaculate Conception, and physical resurrection. It has not taken one drop of blood out of the atonement to weaken it.

The members of this society have enjoyed and testified to the witness of the Holy Spirit, to Christ's saving power.

OUR happy pastorate in this church began 33 years ago and continued for four years. There were two incidents connected with our pastorate here which illustrate our text, and which may be of general interest. First was the conversion of the professional burglar.

At the close of a revival service one night a stranger asked the privilege of walking home with me. When we came to a lonely place in the street he said: "I am a professional burglar. I was on my way to 'crack' a house when I saw the lights in your church and heard the singing and went in. God must have put the sermon into your heart, and put it there for me. When you said the number of sins, or the number of years in sin made no difference to Christ; that He could forgive a million sins as easily as one, and that He could save service, and saying that they had prayed every day for him and had never lost faith that some day he would be redeemed. The burglar was a brilliant young man, was a portrait painter of no mean skill who had fallen into bad company, and gone wrong. The very day after his conversion he went to another city, got a position with good pay, and the last I heard of him he was living a consistent Christian life and was prospering in worldly affairs.

THE second incident illustrating our text is the conversion of the notorious drunkard "Bill" Cary. He came into our revival meeting one night, a wretch and wreck from drink. He came to the altar a poor, repulsive creature. Soon he arose with a face all radiant, and said aloud, "Where is that load gone that was on my shoulders?" Looking at his happy face, I said to him, "It is gone. Christ has taken it from you," and we sang a hymn of thanksgiving for the soul saved. He immediately took up his cross, erected a family altar, attended prayer-meeting and class-meeting, taking part in the exercises and becoming one of the most faithful and efficient members of this church.

A few days after his conversion I went down to his house and found a wretched hovel, the typical drunkard's home, no carpet on the floor, no furniture but a few broken chairs, and a broken table, a bed in one corner where the mother and four children slept; and, in a little room adjoining, a pallet of corn shucks for the drunken father. A year from that time I called again. It was at another number on another street, a nice home with carpets and chairs, and beds and good clothing for wife and children, a Christian gentleman's home. He was making $150 a month when he lived in the hovel, equal to $300 a month now, but the saloon got most of it.

That man was Bill Cary, the locomotive engineer evangelist, known from ocean to ocean for twenty years for his great work in bringing the railroad men of this country to Christ by the hundreds and the thousands. His railroad so arranged his runs that he had his Sundays to devote to evangelistic work. That man is here today, a nicely groomed, handsome old gentleman.

THE salvation of souls by faith in a crucified Christ as revealed in the Scriptures has been one-half of the function of this church, the other half has been the expression of God's life in the character of its members and their impression on the community in acts of practical morals and benevolence. This important function the prophet mentions in the last part of our text: "And my righteousness shall not be abolished."

This church has lived and taught honesty, fair wages and honest service, has given and demanded a square deal in all trades and professions, has promoted the cause of education has given generously to all forms of benevolence, has taught patriotism as a religious duty, having sent its soldiers to the Civil War and the World War, has helped kill the American saloon, has stood against all forms of lawlessness, has made this city and world a better place.

This anniversary will be valueless unless it shall bring a brighter view of the present and a more hopeful outlook on the future. It is expected that this church, which has been one of the strongest in American Methodism, will remain where it is with its plant worth from a half to three quarters of a million dollars, that it will deal wisely with the downtown problem so perplexing, that it will maintain a strict orthodox theology, a warm evangelical preaching, a revival spirit, a loving brotherhood, and continue a power for good in this city with the blessing of God and the favor of man.

The text with one breath speaks of our frailty and mortality, with the next tells of our endless life. This church has always believed the doctrine of eternal life as taught in the texts. "My salvation is forever. They that keep my saying shall never see death."

It seems lonesome today. Most of those who filled these pews thirty-three years ago have gone to the other side. They are not dead. Fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, husbands, sons, daughters, are all alive. With spirit eyes we seem to see their faces today and hear their voices in unison with our hymns of praise. They not only live but they are ours still, just as really as when they were here. We talk about them and call their names, and they think about us and pronounce our names in heaven. Their sweet thoughts come down on our heads like the dew on the flowers at night, and it will not be long till we will take their hands and enjoy their embraces, and go in with them to go out no more forever. "This is life eternal that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent."

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Showers of Blessing," or, "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 46.

Dr. Jowell's Sunday Meditation. (See page 1259, first column.)

Sermon—"THE ENDURING AMIDST THE CHANGING"—to be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Loving Kindness," or "My Jesus, as Thou Wilt."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

And now may the joy that has no bitterness of remorse, and the peace that has no cloud of trouble, and the love that we need towards Thee and one another, keep us strong to do our day's task with eternal hope of the eternal life, in His Name, Who is both Redeemer and King, we ask it, AMEN.

the worst man on earth as easily as the most respectable sinner I felt that possibly there was some hope for me, a thief and murderer.

"And when you talked so tenderly about God's love for the most wretched and vile in the death of His Son upon the Cross, I could not stand it; it melted my heart, and I said to myself, 'I will never cut another window-pane, nor blow open another safe.' And when you said: 'It is not necessary for us to wait till next Sunday, nor till tomorrow night to find the Saviour—not even necessary to wait till the invitation is given to come forward to the altar; you can have Christ just now while I am speaking for the asking—just at that moment I asked God for the sake of Christ to forgive my sins and make me a good man. A sweet peace came to my heart, and I believe that there and then I became a converted man.'"

Suddenly he drew a revolver out of his pocket and shoved it against my breast. I instinctively clapped my hand on my watch, which my sainted father had given to me as a birthday present. Instead of demanding my watch he said: "Take this revolver; I belong to Christ and shall never need it again." Then he took from his pocket some burglar tools and said: "Take these also. I have opened many a window with this, and door with that. I am a Christian man now and shall never want to use them again."

He pulled a roll of bills out of his pocket and said: "I do not need any financial help, but I will ask this favor, that you write my mother and sister in Buffalo and tell them that their wicked son and brother who has broken their hearts has become a good man and will bring honor and not disgrace on them hereafter." I wrote to them and received a most beautiful answer thanking me for the sermon and

The Overflowing Cup

SUNDAY. Psalm 23 : 5. "My cup runneth over." My cup runneth over! Such is the measure of the bountiful hospitality of God. There is no leanness or meanness in His feasts. His provision is never scanty. His resources never come short of our necessity. Nor are they just level with our needs, leaving no margin of grace. The Divine Host welcomes His guests to overflowing bounty. "In My Father's house there is bread enough and to spare!" My cup runneth over.

This magnificent fulness dwells in every promise of the Lord, and it gives radiant distinction to all the ministries of His love. I look at my sin. It is the biggest thing I know. It is piled up like some gloomy, barren mountain in the landscape of my life. I can do nothing with it. If I set myself the task of removal, it is like yoking my weakness to the removal of a mountain, spadeful by spadeful, a helpless and a hopeless labor. And nobody else can do anything with my sin. My friends can pity me, but their pity does not redeem. They can ease my outer circumstances, but the ease is not the mother of vital peace. The awful mountain remains, and it mocks the finest resources of human friendship. It is the biggest thing I know, and I stand before it as impotent as a broken reed.

I am like the psalmist; "My strength faileth because of my iniquity." But if the good Lord mercifully draws near to my sin, how then? Then my biggest thing is vanquished by something bigger, even by the wonderful grace of the Most High. "Where sin abounds, grace doth much more abound." It is like some parochial hillock set in the presence of the Himalayas. Nay, that comparison is ill-suited to express the glorious might of the grace of God. I find a better comparison in some sandhill which children have been piling up on the shore throughout a long day; and God's great sea rolls in, wave upon wave, depth beyond depth, and in its majestic advance the hillock crumbles away, and is levelled with the sandy plain. Where the hill abounded, God's vast sea doth much more abound!

Sin finds its master in grace. The big thing can be buried in the bigger thing. And divine grace is the only bigger thing that can ever be found. But the grace is so wonderful and so abounding that our sin is lost in its infinite depths, as an unclean thing can be dropped in mid-Atlantic and buried in the depths of the sea. God's grace does not just measure up to our sin; it rises above it in overmastering grandeur. We are more than conquerors.

And how is it with my common necessities—the care that pinches me, the sorrows that beset me, the lean circumstances which touch and chill me as with fingers of ice? How is it with human grief and pain? They are big things; the only bigger thing is sin. But these are big and far-stretching. They journey with man wherever man travels and wherever he dwells, whether it be among arctic snows or in the burning sun of the tropics. The gloom of sorrow is like the natural darkness, its circuit engirdles the globe. And where is the antidote of human suffering and sorrow? Who has the magic touch which can wipe away bitter tears? Where is the physician, with wines and cordials in his wallet, which can remove the heavy stuff that weighs upon the heart? Where do our doctors of sorrows live, the skilled practitioners who can dispel heartache, and chase away the grief that saps the mind? Who deals in the secret virtue that is the master of sorrow? Who has the bigger thing?

Only Christ has the bigger thing. "Our consolations also abound in Christ." I love the fulness of the word "abound." Christ's consolations are not ministries which may or may not be equal to our griefs; they overtop them like great waters. Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot heal. There is no grief standing in insolent pride outside and beyond the consolations of grace. Our sorrows may abound, but Christ's consolations more abound. Thus it is that our sorrow is transfigured, and thus it is that "at midnight Paul and Silas, flogged and bleeding, sang praises unto God, and the prisoners heard them." Our Lord's ministries are always abounding. In His grace our cup always runneth over. J. H. J.

The Backward Look

MONDAY. Luke 9 : 62. "No man, having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God." A divided heart is not a good asset in the business of life. Lot's wife, giving a longing look towards Sodom, never took another step in the way of safety. One can't go forward while looking back. We must forget the things that are behind, and forget self while pressing towards the goal of victory. One truly lives only when he consecrates all to win a world for God.

We should do with our might what our hands find to do, in His name and by His strength. Looking backward is turning away from your leader, which means spiritual decline. The next step after looking back is going back—going back into the Egyptian bondage and the indulgence of past evil habits. No one can plough a straight furrow when his attention is attracted with other things.

We are sent forth into this world to plough and cultivate for a great harvest. Our motto should be, "This one thing I do: I press towards the mark for the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus." Gazing back at past failures and pitfalls is discouraging to the soul. Our only hope is in looking unto Jesus, beholding the incoming of His everlasting Kingdom, until He says, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of your Lord." E. W. C.

Stalwart in the Faith

TUESDAY. 1 Thess. 5 : 8. "Putting on the breastplate of faith." We are left in no possible doubt as to the stalwart faith of these men [the early Dutch settlers]. They never swerved from the great verities of the Reformation for which they had adventured their lives in the mother-land. Christ was the sole arbiter of their conscience, Whom they received as King over all and blessed forever. As to their view of Scripture, here it is:

"We receive the books of the Old and New Testament, and these only, as holy and canonical, for the regulation, foundation and confirmation of our faith; believing without any doubt all things contained in them; not so much because the Church receives and approves them as such, but more especially because the Holy Ghost witnesses in our hearts that they are from God."

Such were the early settlers of New Amsterdam. No slackers they, nor waverers, nor loiterers in the middle of the road. Like Gideon's three hundred they would not bend their knees to satisfy their thirst, but dipped up the waters of freedom with their own hands and drank while standing on their feet like men.

The Italians have a legend of an Abbey that long ago was overwhelmed by a landslide in which the monks all perished; but once a year, if you listen, they say you can hear the muffled notes of an organ and the low chanting of prayers. So do the spirits of these ancient worthies speak from afar to us, evoking what response? Shall it be this?

"Faith of our fathers, holy faith,
We will be true to thee till death!"

The Prophet

WEDNESDAY. 1 Chron. 12 : 32. "Men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do." Here is a gem verse in what appears at first to be rather a barren field. These men of the tribe of Issachar were true prophets, because they were men of prophetic insight. It takes no prophet to tell men what they want to do. But it takes wisdom and courage to tell them what they ought to do. Back of the "ought" must lie the knowledge. We have many men of deep commercial insight, and a few men of deep political insight, telling the people what they ought to do. We do not have so many men of deep moral insight. The most desperate need of the world in all ages has been for men of prophetic wisdom, who could translate the writing of the hand upon the wall.

No century and no decade has been without its prophetic signs. Our lack was that we were often without men to interpret them. "Master, we would see a sign from Thee," was the insistent demand of those too blind to read the signs themselves. They could read the weather with fair accuracy, but they could not read anything in the life and words of Jesus. The sign which He gave them, the sign of Jonas, of the Resurrection, of the living Christ, they were powerless to interpret. We need not more signs, but more spiritual vision to read the signs.

Have we, then, no moral insight to observe the drift of national life in other countries so well as our own? Do we not see how surely certain moral causes produce certain moral results, whatever the nation or the age? Are we too blind to see that God is still on His throne, and that no injustice or wrong escapes His eye, no cry of hate or sorrow escapes His ear? While you see the danger, do you also see the cure?

The Eternity of Christ

THURSDAY. John 1 : 1. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God and the Word was God." Biography transmits personality.

The first three Gospels give the early lineage of Jesus' manhood. John's Gospel is a portrait of His Godhead. The first ones tell what Jesus began to do and teach; the last one, what He is in His infinite power and glory. John does not argue; he affirms. He declares in his first sentence the deity and eternity of Christ. He quotes Jesus' sayings about Himself: "I am the bread of life; I am the light of the world; I am the vine; I am the Good Shepherd, I am the door; I am the resurrection and the life."

These sublime words are not recorded in the other Gospels.

Words fail to describe our Lord's dateless sovereignty. "In the beginning, God created." That first Bible sentence is descriptive of Christ as Creator. John seeks to describe Him before the beginning of creation; He was with the Father, He was God before worlds had a being.

With our Lord it is said there is really no B.C. It is all A.D. For He was before all things; before Bethlehem or Calvary and will be forever afterwards. The skeptic can take his choice between "In the beginning, God," or nothing. John says of his Gospel: "These words are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His Name." The miracles were but little flashes from the temple of His being, while the domé of His divinity shines unveiled by the writer of this Gospel. E. W. C.

Our Critics

FRIDAY. Luke 6 : 26. "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you." I was talking with a police justice the other day up in New York State. He was a clean-cut, youngish man with a frank eye and well-set jaw. He seemed to have grasped with uncommon intelligence the rare idea that public office is a public trust. Somebody had threatened him because he had done his duty. Some drunken rowdies, ex-convicts, had visited his town in an automobile, "painted the town red and raised rough-house generally." This young justice had committed them to the penitentiary. The justice sat on the porch of his home and told me all about it. "I am always complimented by what my enemies say of me," he explained. "If my friends criticize me, then I am able to see my points of weakness and correct them; and if my enemies criticize, I am even better pleased, for then I know that they have had to resort to slander and falsehood to say anything at all. A man's virtues are always advertised by what his enemies say about him."

And I thought, "Diogenes may throw away his lantern." The public officer who is above being a trimmer, who is too big to set his sails to catch the passing breezes of popularity, who does what is right simply because it is right is a rare exception. It takes less ability to criticize and more ability to be a good friendly critic, than to be anything else.

Of course, we want men to speak well of us; but if some men spoke well of us, we would be under just suspicion. It is a high compliment to have many men disagree with us about many things. As the young justice said, "it advertises a man's virtues." H. P. H.

The Mission of the Church

SATURDAY. Matt. 28 : 19. "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations." Here we are, after the expiration of nineteen centuries, with twelve hundreds of millions of people in the world who have never even been told that Christ lived and suffered in their behalf! The reason is clear. Once when He was preaching on the coming of His Kingdom and the end of the present order of things He was asked, "When shall this be?" and His answer was, "The Gospel must first be preached throughout the whole world; then shall the end be."

Observe He did not say that the world must be converted before His coming, but that the Church must sound the trumpet until its message of salvation had penetrated the far-away jungles of the remotest region of the earth.

These are the terms of the Great Commission, and by them every member of the full Christian Church is made responsible, up to the full measure of his ability, for the propagation of the Gospel until the last man in the world has heard it.

Dreams and visions have their use and time; but the mystic who contents himself with "sweetness and light" instead of coveting the baptism of fire and power, will find but a meager heaven awaiting him. We cannot "sit and sing ourselves away to everlasting bliss," when the fields are white unto the harvest and there is a shortage of workmen. The Church is a Labor Guild; and to every, even the humblest, follower of Christ, comes the injunction, "Go work today!" D. J. B.

Can We Advertise Christianity?

No 3. The Church as a Distributing Medium

By ANDERSON PACE

(Instructor in Advertising and Business Organization, Columbia University)

NOT the least important thing in the world is "Exchange"—the exchange of necessities, the exchange of utilities, the exchange of conveniences, the exchange of labor, the exchange of thought.

In a world where population is scattered broadcast and millions live far away from sources that take care of their everyday needs, it is very desirable—in fact necessary—for them to be able to exchange the products of their labor for others which are produced far away from them.

Because all the useful conveniences that we demand in our civilized existences are not made at our doorsteps, it is necessary for the world to be supplied with a system of exchange, which we sometimes call "Distribution."

The maintenance of life, the development of the race, the increase of intelligence, the welfare of society, all depend upon the system of exchange, this distribution of commodities, labor, thought—a statement which was most painfully proved at the time of our late railway tie-up, when one of the great factors of distribution was paralyzed.

In speaking of distribution, most people think in terms of merchandise—to them, distribution is a matter of business. However, business merely provides the machinery to take care of the exchange of these tangible products and goods which provide the elements of shelter, clothing, food, etc., for the race.

It may sound like an extreme statement to the readers of this article to say that the distribution of thought and truth is as important as the distribution of foods and clothing. Society does more than eat and drink, wear clothes and live in houses; Society acts. And just as the acts of the individual determine the individual's progress, welfare and even existence, so do the acts of society determine the development, the persistence, even the very existence of society.

If an individual were told and convinced that a deadly poison were wholesome and fit for consumption, and acted accordingly, that individual might speedily put himself out of the world of acts altogether. Society, if it is misinformed, and acts upon this misinformation, is just as apt to injure itself and possibly work towards its own dissolution.

The distribution of facts, the exchange of truth, is consequently essential; and yet, today, there is no scientific scheme for the distribution of truth. There is no organization designed to supply facts to the public that compares in efficiency and unity with the organization that supplies commodities.

UPON whom, or upon what, falls the duty of distributing truth and facts?

Does that look like a duty for the Church?

Is there any function which the Church can perform more important than the function it can carry out in the field of fact and truth distribution?

It is much easier to answer to this question than it is to build the plans for transforming the question into action.

To some readers, these primary remarks may sound as if they were leading up to a proposition to make churches into forums.

In fact, this is one of the aims—not to turn churches into debating societies, but to add to their functions that of information distributor.

Such increase of functions in no way interferes with the primary function of the Church, the preaching of the Gospel, and it is not the purpose of this series of articles to give rise to the slightest presumption that this work is not the first and deepest duty of the Church.

But even the application of the principles of Christ can be made more effective and intelligent if those who seek to apply them know the truth about the economic, the political, the industrial, the educational world.

And a discussion of the assumption of this truth-distributing function by a church is important in a series of articles on Church Advertising because this work of distribution is a self-advertisement and, at the same time, a promoter of all other forms of activity in the Church. This work will gain the attention of people that other church activities would not reach, will develop the interest of people otherwise unattainable, will bring into contact with the Church individuals whom the Sunday service would not get, and thus bring to bear the influence of the Church as a whole, on people who are outside of its sphere today.

YOU may say: "What is the matter with the schools, the colleges, the universities? Why not leave this job to the newspapers? Aren't these agencies distributing facts and truth more systematically, more helpfully, than the Church can do?"

We grant that information is being distributed by schools, colleges, universities and newspapers, but not always in a way that serves society best.

First of all, some of these agencies are not dealing with current facts at all.

The grammar-schools are teaching "Reading, writing and arithmetic"; the high schools "History, languages, mathematics, natural science." Most of the work is pure preparation for the juvenile mind.

The honest interpretation of present-day facts and happenings is outside the problems of the elementary schools. Others of these agencies are too limited in scope, even if they did spend much time on "The World Today." The colleges, for example, cover only a small percentage of society. Few, comparatively, of the people who pass through elementary schools ever reach the colleges.

The newspapers are insufficient for several reasons:

First of all, they specialize in news that will sell papers, that will catch the public eye; next, they are supported more by advertising income than by the pennies that the newsboys get; and as a result, few of them can escape the bias of the business office.

Most newspapers are the organ of a party or class, and their outpourings necessarily do not run counter to the necessities of the classes they represent. They are organs and so seldom give the reader a complete picture.

SNOW-IN THE CITY

By Margaret E. Sangster

The city shivers in a coat of sleet,
And, underneath the greyness of the sky,
A million frightened snowflakes whirl and fly.
The slush is moist underneath our feet,
And gales that rush around each corner meet
With other gales that seem to crouching lie
In wait for heedless folk who hurry by—
The world lies pallid in its winding-sheet!

And yet, despite the snowstorm and the gale,
We see the human side of one another;
A big policeman helps somebody's mother,
As gently as a knight in coat of mail—
And every smile upon a stranger face,
Brings unexpected sunshine to the place!

Finally these various agencies are hampered in their information-distributing function by virtue of the fact that they are non-religious.

WE BELIEVE the separation of political and religious institutions desirable. At the same time, a system of truth distribution that is not based upon the principles of Christ lacks the very element that makes such distribution helpful to its recipients. For over 1900 years, the principles of Christ have been recognized as the correct principles of life, and economists are coming more and more to realize and to admit that our present economic, social and political system can not survive and render efficient service to humanity if it is not based upon these principles.

It is the first business of the Church not merely to spread the teachings of Christianity, but to do its best to gain acceptance of the principles of Christianity by all people with whom it comes in contact. This is neither subject to argument nor needful of proof. Since this is so, are we not willing to grant that the Church can go a step further and add to its function of Christianizing that of truth distribution?

A certain church that has gained a reputation for itself is a distributor of information, as a spreader of truth, as an increaser of knowledge, has established a forum in which both sides of all questions can be presented.

On regular nights, questions are discussed before an open forum in which two or more speakers, representing opposite sides of certain subjects, give forth their views. At the close, on the formal program, the meeting is thrown open to the audience for questions or further discussion. According to reports reaching the Christian Herald, the results of this system have been salutary.

This is not a unique instance; many churches are carrying on activities of this kind with the result that their congregations are adding to their stores of information and getting broader views on many mooted questions. Furthermore, people are being brought under the influence of the Church, with the result that some of them remain.

IT MAY be apropos at this point to consider a criticism made by a reader of this series, who maintains that the Church does not need publicity. This critic asks why the Church should stoop to advertising when it is the mouthpiece of the Lord, and consequently, the possessor of more than human power.

This critic strongly assails any one who would suggest that the Church should carry on outside activities to bring in prospective members. He believes, apparently, that the preaching of the message is sufficient, and that it is the power alone that will not merely convert people but will bring them within reach of its converting power.

In this connection we can reiterate our belief in the power of prayer, in the omnipotence of the Gospel message, but we do not believe (to state it extremely) that a minister on an uninhabited island would gain many followers, no matter how hard he preached. We are a little bit more inclined to favor the attitude of a ministerial friend who says: "Get people within hearing distance and the message will do the rest."

Going back to the Bible, we also find that Christ urged His apostles not to set up a temple and wait for the people to come, but to go into all parts of the world and preach the Gospel. He also urged His apostles to do more than preach, so that the modern minister has a good precedent to follow if he engages in work outside the confines of his pulpit, the walls of his church, the limits of his congregation.

AFTER this digression, it may be well to ask, what all the preceding has to do with advertising and the Church?

What do forum meetings or the spreading of the truth about current affairs have to do with the advertising of Christianity?

Let us answer that all advertising is not the printed page, and that the best advertising is often the word of the mouth. It is for this reason that so much space has been taken in this article to emphasize the desirability of bringing people into hearing distances of the Church where Christ's Gospel is preached.

In the first number of this series, numerous quotations from the Bible were given to show the many times apostles of Christ were urged to publish, to proclaim, to advertise the teachings of the Gospel, and in many places in the Bible, people are urged to learn the truth, and thus free themselves from the shackles of ignorance.

Even today, we hear constant paraphrases of the old injunction, "Know the truth and it will make you free."

With this pattern before us, how then can we fail to see that perhaps the first step in the advertising of the Church and the advertising of Christianity is to tell the truth by word of mouth to as many as will listen, and then trust in the power of the Church's message to enlist the hearers under the banner of the Church?

in China, and the present price of rice, quoted by a New York rice brokerage firm. A pound and a quarter of rice a day is necessary for a Chinese to live and the present price of this food is 3 cents a pound. This would supply food for the entire number of Chinese starving as a result of the present famine, 45,000,000, for 151 days, tiding them over until early June.

There are 25,000,000 families, government statistics show, in the United States. The well-balanced Christmas dinner for the average family of five, according to New York food authorities, consisted of soup, turkey, cranberries, two vegetables (boiled onions and mashed potatoes, for example), salad, mince pie, coffee, nuts, raisins and fruit. And this specimen dinner for five would require a ten-pound turkey, two quarts of cranberries, three pounds of onions and the same quantity of potatoes, in addition to the ingredients

FROM Charles R. Crane, the American Minister to China, the Christian Herald has received the following cable message:

"Peking, December 20.

"The present calamity is the worst in forty years. Fifteen million people are facing death from starvation and cold. See statement cabled to Department of State.

"CHARLES R. CRANE."

for soup, salad and mince pie, as well as the coffee, nuts, raisins and fruit.

The price of turkey just previous to the holiday in the New York retail market ranged from 50 to 75 cents a pound, so a fair average price, said one authority, would be 60 cents. Onions cost 10 and potatoes 5 cents a pound, and cranberries 20 cents a quart. The estimated cost of a mince pie for the standard family would necessitate an expenditure of between $1 and $1.25 and soup, salad, nuts, raisins, fruit and coffee would add another two dollars.

From the quotations and other figures given, America's Christmas dinner cost each family about $10, or $2 a plate. Of course, many families spent less, while, on the other hand, many spent more, so that $10 a dinner is considered the average expenditure of each American family.

And while America feasted in this fashion, those millions in North China were starving. It will be months before the new crops can make them self-sustaining once more. There still is time to help. Surely the American people will respond to their appeal.

The Dormant Church That Awoke

How a Little Prayer Band Brought About a Soul-Stirring Revival

WHEN I read about the church that wasn't doing anything for the community I fairly gasped for it was a most accurate description of conditions in our own church.

Yesterday there were six at the regular Sabbath service. One was from out of town and only three of the regular attendants were absent.

Five or six years ago we were in a similar condition and no longer able to support a resident pastor, and were supplied from other points.

In the course of time a pastor came to us who was deeply evangelistic—on fire, with zeal for the redemption of souls. He re-established the prayer meeting and made revival work the keynote. Week after week, a little handful of people gathered and prayed earnestly for a revival of the work of the Master—first in their own hearts, then in others.

This continued for months and finally it seemed the time was ripe for evangelistic services. Nothing indicated it but faith as the outgrowth of prayer.

Meetings were held every night with three afternoon meetings a week. The second week the spirit of God seemed to be abroad in the community. People began coming to church. Those who did not come were stirred—some in one way and some another.

Still the little band kept on praying like Jacob of old, and souls began coming to Christ. Fifteen-minute prayer meetings were held prior to each service and they were the most wonderful meetings I ever attended. It was a time of consecration and sacrifice. It was a gathering of the "inner circle"—the church within the church. There we pleaded with God for the conversion of our friends and neighbors, carrying them by name to the throne of grace; and often went to the church to see them surrender themselves to God.

The work of grace was not all outside the church. The spiritual life of all was deepened and strengthened and many of the church members for the first time realized what companionship with God meant.

The meetings continued for four weeks and at that time every one who attended them was professing Christ. Several of the little praying band had not missed a service.

An Epworth League was formed. Many were baptized and taken into our church. Our neighborhood church also increased its membership as a result of our work. The community awoke to the needs of the church and the following summer we expended about five hundred dollars in repairing our place of worship. I wish I could end my story here, but I feel that in justice I must write the remainder. The next year we did not do any evangelistic work and we could see that the church was growing lukewarm.

Finally we had two weeks of evangelistic service and they were as cold and matter-of-fact as my account of them. Not a soul came to God. Why the difference? We were not so much in the spirit of prayer. We did not sacrifice. We did not put God and his work first.

I think the first revival was the remedy for the church that was not doing anything for the community. And I think that we failed to continue using the remedy. Indifference is a disease of the church that needs constant attention. Prayer, consecration, sacrifice, zeal and push must be used to overcome it. We must not keep back a portion of the price, like Ananias of old. Our all must be on the altar.

The Week After New Year's

IT IS usually with a fine fervor that we make our New Year's resolutions. We are so sure of ourselves on New Year's

When Doubts Begin to Creep in About the Future of Those Resolutions

morning; we are so certain that we will never repeat the mistakes of a year ago! In the past we have known discouragement and met with failure—in the past we have clasped hands with defeat and, perhaps, shirked many a responsibility. But, despite discouragement and failure and defeat, we are pleasantly conscious, on New Year's morning, of the fact that Father Time has turned over a clean white leaf for us to write upon. We are pleasantly conscious of the fact that the writing has been erased, again, from life's slate.

We make our New Year's resolutions buoyantly—notwithstanding the fact that we have made, and failed to keep, many resolutions in the past. We make them smilingly, with assurance in our souls and a song in our hearts. Nothing seems too hard to accomplish with a New Year stretched out, like a shining road, across the future. Nothing seems too large to promise, too difficult to undertake. Why, there's a whole twelve months in which to fulfil our promises—a whole three hundred and sixty-five days in which to redeem our pledges. We are so sure of ourselves on New Year's morning!

We are sure of ourselves on New Year's morning. But on the week after New Year's some of our bright confidence has worn away. On the week after the day that we made our resolutions some of the rosy tint has faded from the fabric of our hopes and plans. Somehow, with a week of the New Year behind us, fifty-two weeks seems a fairly short time. Somehow, with seven days gone, three hundred and sixty-five days seem no great number! The week after New Year's is inclined to be a week in which doubt enters the scene—a week in which a slight fear of the future becomes apparent.

I USED to go to school with a girl I whom we called "the Promiser." She was a nice enough girl—one of the very nicest in the school. But she had a quite terrible habit of promising to do things—and then calmly neglecting to keep her promise.

The things that she promised were never vital things. A luncheon party perhaps, or an engagement to go walking, or a bit of mending for her mother. It never made any real difference when she forgot to go to the luncheon, when the engagement to go walking slipped her mind, when she neglected to do the bit of mending. She was always so genuinely sorry when folk chided her—she always promised, so earnestly, never to do it again. And we, who knew and loved her, were ready to make excuses for her. "She doesn't mean anything!" we'd say. Or, "It's just her way!" And then we would weave together the ragged edges of our plans—and go on without her.

And yet, it isn't at all surprising that, after a time, we began to take her promises very lightly. When she'd suggest something we'd nod our heads, pleasantly, and change the subject. When she'd volunteer to do something we'd thank her—in our prettiest manner—and promptly disregard the suggestion. And we were wont to laugh, with an easy tolerance, at her promises.

Of course the girl came to resent our attitude. Almost any girl of spirit would have resented our attitude. She grew sulky, sometimes, when we left her out of our definite plans—when we did not include her in our parties. And then, finally, she asked us, point-blank, the reason for our attitude.

"You treat me like a baby," she exploded, furiously, one day. "It's unkind! When I say that I'll help, you turn my offer aside. When I offer to do anything you smile—and accept some other person's offer. Why do you treat me in such a mean way?"

Our group was silent for a moment. And then one of us answered:

The girl was angry. She showed it very plainly.

"Little shepherd boy?" she questioned. "I don't know what you're talking about!"

THE other girl was trying hard not to laugh. After a moment she spoke. "Once upon a time," she said gravely, "there was a shepherd boy. He went into the hills every day to tend his father's sheep—quite a flock of them there were—and," the girl laughed again, "I expect that he was bored; just sitting around watching sheep! That was probably why he began it all—that's why he probably invented the wolf in the first place." She paused, and, at our eager questions, hurried on. "You see," she said, "in that part of the country there were many wolves—large, hungry wolves. They lived in the hills and, when the flocks were peacefully grazing, they would creep down and seize a lamb and run away with it. And the lamb would be eaten. And so the different shepherds had an agreement that they would call for help whenever one of them saw a wolf. That's where the story of this particular shepherd boy comes in!

"As I said, he was bored. After sitting in one spot for a couple of hours he wanted a little excitement. So, thinking of the agreement among the shepherds, he started suddenly to call aloud to the others. 'Help, help!' he called, 'a wolf—a wolf!'

"Of course the other shepherds came running to him. But when they got there they found only a gleeful boy who told them that there was no wolf—that he had only been fooling. And they went back, angry and out of breath.

"During the day, several times, the shepherd boy called out for help. And every time he called the others came running up, only to find that the whole thing was a joke. And so they began to be very cross indeed; to cherish very hard feelings against the boy. 'We won't let him fool us any more!' they muttered, 'we won't be made sport of!'

"And so," again the narrator was laughing, "and so the next time the boy called, nobody came to answer the call. And he called again, and still nobody answered him. And he called a third time, and there was real fear in his voice. And still nobody answered him!"

There was silence in our little group for a minute. And then the girl that we had nicknamed "the Promiser" asked a question.

"Why," she asked, "was there fear in the shepherd boy's voice?"

The girl who had told the story answered, and the laughter had died out of her voice.

"Because," she said, "because he really was frightened. You see, a wolf had come! But no one can blame the other shepherds for not answering his call."

FRIENDS of mine, it's better to make a few promises that you will really be able to keep than to make a great many that will have to be neglected. You're apt to have a better reputation for truth, a better standing in the community, if you pledge yourself to do only a few things—and do them well!

And so, a week after New Year's if you have made only the resolutions that you can do justice to, you will be much happier than the folk who have made so many and such elaborate resolutions that they are swamped by them. You'll find that people are more likely to expect worth-while things of you.

No one wants to be called a "Promiser." No one wants to be regarded by his fellows as the little shepherd boy was regarded. Because a time may come—one week or many weeks after the New Year—when you'll want folks to know that you can make a promise and keep it!

"We haven't meant to be unkind, dear," she said gently, "but we've come to feel that you're just a bit like the little shepherd boy."

Our All for the Kingdom

By LUTHER DENNY WHITTEMORE, Litt.D.

THE scene in which the rich young ruler came to Jesus to ask what good thing he should do that he might have eternal life, is one which appeals powerfully to the imagination, and it has been visualized in the well-known painting by George F. Watts. Matthew's description is, in its simplicity, like a work of art, in which only the essentials are portrayed while the imagination must supply such details as are needed to complete the mental picture. The value of the artist's work and of the writer's words depends upon their power to awaken appropriate images in the mind of the beholder or the reader. Hence our study of this lesson will be an effort to hold for a moment in the focus of our consciousness the various thoughts and images which are suggested by the impressive story.

The great question. In contrast with the multitudes which followed Jesus, seeking to attract His attention to an infinite variety of infirmities and needs, the rich young ruler came alone, not bringing a sick body to be healed, nor sins to be forgiven, nor complaints to be adjusted, but to ask one supreme question, the greatest and most baffling which his mind could conceive—how he might obtain eternal life.

Others had come to Jesus with physical ills and bodily needs, and some with sinful lives, and all such had been healed and blessed. Here was one whose greatest need was not physical but spiritual, and he himself was not fully conscious of its nature. He belonged to the prosperous group in society. To others as well as to himself he seemed to be one who had no lack; but abounding in the possession of this world's goods, he prudently desired to make provision for the life to come.

What his conception of "eternal life" was, we do not know. Even now non-religious people habitually have distorted views of religious truth, and fail to comprehend the meaning of the language of the Kingdom of Heaven; and there is a real danger that those who call themselves Christians may thoughtlessly assent to familiar creeds and repeat pious phrases when there is nothing or but little in the life itself that corresponds. The questioner of Jesus had at least one basal conviction—that there must be some connection between the present life and the life eternal; but the true Christian goes one step further and believes that eternal life begins, not in the hereafter, but here and now.

The question answered. Jesus' answer to this inquirer is characteristic of His method. Acknowledging the courteous address, "Good Master," and apparently, but not really, disclaiming its proper application to Himself, Jesus met the rich man on his own ground by quoting the familiar commandments that prescribe duties towards men, placing as the climax that epitome of Christian doctrine, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." The young man was so confident of his worthiness that he did not realize the meaning of this command. He had not been taught, as the lawyer who had asked a similar question had been taught by the parable of the Good Samaritan, that a neighbour is any one who needs help; for if he had truly loved such a neighbour as he loved himself, it would have been a most natural thing to share all his possessions with him. Thus Jesus' answer did not impose a duty in addition to the acknowledged obligation, but proposed a simple test to show whether all the commandments had been observed.

Mark says that Jesus, beholding the young man, loved him, and there was much in his attitude that seems commendable. He was capable of high thinking, and his question revealed a certain nobility of mind and character. The object which he sought was worthy, although his conception of eternal life may have been imperfect. He was honorable, for he proposed to do some good thing in exchange for the good desired. He came to the proper source of authority. He was familiar with the commandments and sincerely believed that he had kept them all. When he went away he was sorrowful, thus showing involuntarily that his heart and conscience did not approve the failure of his will.

Among the contrasts suggested by this incident the most striking is implied in the two questions, "Why callest thou me good?" and "What lack I yet?" Here is an expression of perfect humility and perfect self-approval. Jesus, the embodiment of goodness, refused the title "good," because the speaker did not recognize Him in His true character; but when on another occasion Peter with newly awakened faith declared, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," Jesus accepted the tribute of a sincere disciple with commendation of the faith and loyalty which prompted the great confession. The young ruler's lack, of which he was not conscious, was the lack of humility and willingness to serve. If he was a seeker after the kingdom of God, he failed because he did not seek the kingdom first.

ACCORDING to His custom Jesus explained to the disciples the principles of the kingdom which were involved in the incident which they, perhaps, had witnessed. He did not condemn the rich young ruler for his failure to meet the test of brotherliness; but declared that riches are a hindrance to entrance into the Kingdom of Heaven. Neither did He say that this hindrance could not be overcome; for it is not the existence of wealth nor its possession, but its selfish use that is contrary to the Christian law of love.

Jesus' philosophy of conduct is simple but comprehensive. A little child who has a loving heart is typical of the true Christian; and those disciples who for Christ's sake and in imitation of Him are chiefly concerned not in their own welfare, but in the welfare of others, will have the reward of righteousness—that is, the opportunity for larger service. Time and talent and gifts of personality, as well as money, are to be shared, not hoarded.

The unselfish spirit is everywhere to be commended, and the motive which inspires self-denial gives to the act its moral quality.

In these days when amazing opportunities there are to apply the teaching of Jesus concerning the use of wealth! Never in all history has need been greater. The laws of Christian brotherhood require each one according to his ability to help to feed his hungry and starving neighbors, although they may live on the other side of the world and although distance dulls sensibility to their suffering. The true remedy lies not only in temporary relief, although that is essential, but in comprehensive plans for the removal of the causes of all preventable disasters, and in the establishment of brotherly relations among all nations. For this, Christian statesmanship of the highest order is needed.

Because Jesus brought into the world a new idea regarding the consecration of wealth and talent, agencies for charity and relief have been multiplied; and the generous response shown everywhere to appeals for help is a wonderful indication that the brotherhood is surely drawing nearer.

a. What does the question of the rich young ruler suggest regarding Jesus' reputation?

b. Is the obligation of those who are "very rich" different from the obligation of those who are moderately well-to-do?

c. Are the very poor relieved from the obligation to love their neighbors? How may love be manifested except by giving money?

Now Brush Teeth

In the new way—Remove the film

Try this new way of teeth cleaning. The test is free. It has brought to millions whiter, safer teeth. Leading dentists everywhere advise it.

See the results, then learn what they mean to you.

What ruins teeth

Teeth are ruined by a film. You can feel it—that viscous coat. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. And most tooth troubles are now traced to it.

It is this film-coat that discolors—not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Five important effects

Pepsodent has five effects, all of them essential to cleaner, safer teeth. One ingredient is pepsin. One multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva to combat starch deposits that cling. One multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva to neutralize mouth acids.

In two ways it attacks the film directly. Then it keeps the teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily cling.

It differs vastly from the old-time

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Brushed in the usual way, much of that film is left. And very few people have escaped the troubles that it causes.

Now we combat it

Dental science has in late years found a way to fight film, day by day. High authorities have proved it by many careful tests.

Millions of people have adopted it, largely by dental advice. To careful people it is bringing a new era in teeth cleaning.

These new methods are all embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And you are urged to prove it by a pleasant ten-day test.

tooth pastes, which dentists now know were wrong.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Adventures of the Food Family—Dried Peaches

ATERRIBLE storm which had been threatening for a week had finally centered with great fury about the Lighthouse, and for several days all communication with the mainland was cut off. No small boat could possibly have weathered the angry sea, and during these anxious days the food travelers were making their appearance by way of the long flight of stone steps from the basement, instead of being welcomed at the little boat landing.

On the afternoon, however, when Mother Gilson was planning for the Sunday dinner, she said to Jane, "I shall have a Dutch peach layer cake for dessert, so we must summon from the storeroom a little company of the peach family that we prepared last summer to remain with us all these months."

"Oh, you mean the peaches we dried!" exclaimed Jane. "I wonder how they will look when we bring them up! Their pink and yellow color was changed to brown before we packed them away, so I suppose they can't look very much worse."

"Dried and wrinkled as mummies!" exclaimed Sara in dismay when she saw them.

"Well, I shall be able to do something toward improving their looks, before I cook them," said Mother, "and after they are prepared and put into my layer cake you will think they have returned to the condition in which they arrived four months ago, their flavor will be so little changed.

"I shall wash them thoroughly first in slightly warm water, and clip off with a sharp scissors any little stem ends there may be on the fruit, as the eggs of insects are often lodged in these little crevices. A pound of dried peaches needs to be covered with three cupfuls of water in which they must soak for twelve hours."

Next morning Mother drained off the water in which the peaches had been soaking all night, and stewed them carefully with a very little sugar.

"There is great danger in oversweetening dried fruits, which results in a sickening compound which few people relish and which prevents the natural flavor from redeveloping in the fruit," she explained to Sara. "All those dried fruits that we have put away in the cellar are very much cheaper than the first quality of canned fruits, their flavor is excellent, and for cooking purposes they answer quite as well."

In making the Dutch dried peach layer cake Mother then prepared a rich baking-powder dough which she rolled very thin. This she spread with butter substitute, dusted with sugar and ground cinnamon and fitted into a shallow pan. Across the top in rows, she then placed quarters of the cooked dried peaches, which had been carefully drained. Each piece was pressed lightly into the dough, sprinkled with dried currants and then basted with a couple of tablespoonfuls of the syrup in which the peaches had been cooked.

"Now we will bake it in a quick oven," exclaimed Mrs. Gilson, as she opened the door of the kitchen range; "and in a very short time our little peach friends will end their adventure on our dinner-table."

DRIED PEACH CONSERVE

COVER one pound of dried peeled peaches with cold water and let stand over night. In the morning add one cupful of stoned raisins cut in pieces, half a cupful of coarsely chopped English walnut meats, the juice of one orange and one lemon, one orange sliced thin and one pound of sugar. Bring to the boiling point and simmer, stirring frequently over a moderate heat until of the consistency of marmalade.

EGGLESS FRUIT CAKE

Neutralize one cupful of sour milk by adding one teaspoonful of soda. Combine with one cupful of sugar and four tablespoonfuls of melted butter and one-fourth of a teaspoonful of salt. Add two cupfuls of flour which has been sifted with three teaspoonfuls of baking-powder and one-half teaspoonful each of cloves, mace and nutmeg, together with one teaspoonful of cinnamon. Lastly add one-half cupful of chopped citron and raisins. Bake in a slow oven for about one hour.

SPICED PRUNES

Wash half a pound of prunes, soak in a pint of water over night, and in the morning put on to cook with a shredded rind of one lemon and a spice bag containing two blades of mace, one teaspoonful of whole cloves, half a teaspoonful of whole allspice, and a broken stick of cinnamon. Simmer until the fruit is very tender and add one-half a cupful of sugar, when the fruit has cooked for half an hour. Season with a quarter of a cupful of vinegar and the juice of a lemon five minutes before removing from the fire. This is delicious to serve with cold meat.

A RICE-TOMATO DISH

Cook one onion, cut in small pieces in two tablespoonfuls of drippings, preferably bacon, until tender. Add two cupfuls of tomatoes and boil five minutes. Run through a strainer, add two tablespoonfuls of chopped pimento, and two of green peppers, salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Boil ten minutes. Add one tablespoonful of flour, mixed with a little cold water, and blend with mixture. Pour into a greased casserole dish and break in four eggs, allowing them to keep their shape if possible. Cover with cooked rice and dot with butter and bake until brown.

BEEF OMELET

One small pair of beef brains, one teaspoonful of chopped parsley, one tablespoonful of butter, one onion, three eggs, one teaspoonful of grated cheese, three tablespoonfuls of water, pepper and salt. Scald the brains and remove the skin. Parboil for about fifteen minutes. Chop fine and add the eggs, after they have been well beaten. Then add the water, parsley, cheese and seasoning. Pour into a pan with the onion, which has been slightly browned in the butter. Let brown on one side, then turn, as any omelet, and brown on the other side.

A Children's Party

FOR the birthday party of a small child, it is difficult to think of anything sufficiently simple to fit the enjoyment capacity of the little tots. This one may appeal to some mother who has been puzzling her brain for something that children of four and five could enjoy.

The middle of the table carried, as its decoration a circus tent made of white crepe paper with touches of red. Sticks held it in place high enough so that the animals inside could be seen. The menagerie was composed of animal crackers standing in a circle—two by two—elephants, lions, tigers, sheep, horses, camels and goats. In the center of the ring was a small see-saw made of cardboard on which two cracker elephants were perched. Each cracker animal stood erect on a small sugar wafer. This was done by dipping the feet of the cracker animal into hard taffy while it was hot, pushing them gently into the wafer and the candy, hardening almost immediately, held the animals in place.

After the feast came an animal hunt in the parlor. Cracker animals were hidden everywhere, and the child who collected the largest number received a prize—which could be a nice gray elephant or a brown bear.

The Gilsons' Mail-Bag

DEAR Lady of the Lighthouse: Perhaps you, like many of us, have begun to use the dried fruits that must take the place of the fresh that is so expensive at this time of year. Grapefruit and apples and cranberries may be used to provide variety, but for everyday use in the winter I find that dried fruits must be our mainstay. I wished to tell you that the left-over juice from the cooked dried fruit should not be wasted, as it makes delicious sauces and may also be added to other dried fruit when it is being cooked or added to grapefruit and sliced oranges.

Norwood, Mass. ELLA BROWNLEY.

Dear Lighthouse Lady:

A well-made gravy adds so much to the meat roast that I am sending you this one that is recommended by the home economic department of the U. S. Department of Agriculture for use with mutton.

Allow two level tablespoonfuls of fat for each cupful of gravy desired, pouring off any in excess of this amount. To the fat, add three tablespoonfuls of flour and cook thoroughly, browning it, but being careful not to burn it. Add boiling water or broth and boil for a short time, stirring constantly. Add salt and pepper. The proportions are two tablespoonfuls of fat, three tablespoonfuls of flour, and one cupful of water or stock.

This makes a rich and wholesome brown gravy, which will be enjoyed by all.

STRING sets of buttons on a strong linen thread or on a fine wire when you put them away and you will save much time when you start to hunt in the button-box.

Dry celery leaves, crush them into powder, add salt and you have an excellent celery salt.

All bits of soap should be saved, melted with a little warm water, put into a bottle and used for softsoap.

Hard-boiled eggs cut into fine pieces and put into the chicken soup will make it rich.

Instead of sewing on the baby's bonnet strings fasten them on with snaps. You can then have several sets and change them to fresh ones at a moment's notice.

An empty perfume bottle with a patent top is fine for sprinkling clothes. Keep all salad-dressing bottles with screw tops. Put into them nutmegs and all kinds of spice. You can see what you are using and they look well on the pantry shelf.

To freshen the lining of a waist that has become soiled at the neck and across the shoulders, untack it from the gown, put it over a double portion of bath towel, and lay on an ironing board or table. Make a lather of soap chips, and with a nail brush go over the soiled parts thoroughly. Then rinse by using brush and clear water until free from soap. Dry and press.

Powdered orris root under the ironing blanket will perfume the clothes as they are ironed.

Wet shoes should be stuffed with paper, which will absorb the moisture and prevent the shoes from getting hard.

To extract juice from an onion, cut a slice from the root end, remove the skin and rub the onion on a coarse grater, using a rotary motion.

To iron ribbons that have been washed, wrap smoothly around a glass jar. Then fill the jar with hot water and the ribbons will dry quickly and will also be smooth and soft.

A good double boiler substitute is a glass jar set in a pan of water. Put a rubber ring under the bottle to prevent breakage.

When making lemonade, run the lemon through the food chopper. The juice will be so strong that it will make twice the usual amount.

The flavor of cutlets is much improved if the bread-crumbs in which they are rolled are mixed with a little white pepper, salt and savory herbs.

"In Case of Cough or Cold—Musterole"

He takes no chances. On the road or at home, Musterole is his faithful old router-out of colds and congestions. Twenty years ago they used to put a stinging, messy mustard plaster on his chest when he had a cold. It was a harsh but effective remedy.

Today he uses Musterole. It does all the work of the old-fashioned plaster, but is without the fuss, muss, and blister.

You just rub a little of this clean white ointment over the congested spot. First, there is a gentle tingle, then a soothing coolness. But way down deep underneath the coolness, where Musterole has penetrated, there is generated a peculiar heat which soon disperses congestion and sends the cold away.

And Musterole is good for many other things. For twinging joints or aching muscles, for instance. Keep Musterole always handy on the bathroom shelf. At all drug stores, jars at 35c and 65c. $3.00 hospital size.

It was feared the Bolsheviki were preparing to launch a new offensive movement on a great scale against their weaker neighbors.

Forty thousand Red troops were said to be massed at Gatchina, near the Estonian frontier and on the direct railroad line from Petrograd to Revel, the Estonian capital. Estonia, the first Baltic state to make peace with the Soviet government, has been rather Bolshevik in political sympathies, and it was declared the extensive Red propaganda had undermined the loyalty of a considerable portion of the Estonian army.

Bolshevik troops also have been advancing toward the Lithuanian frontier, particularly in the district from which a drive against Vilna would be started. A plebiscite is to be held in Vilna, which was seized by Polish forces acting ostensibly in defiance of the Warsaw government, and a Russian attack in this area would involve the League of Nations, since that organization is directing the plebiscite.

Supplies captured from General Wrangel have improved greatly the armament of the Red forces and fresh troops have been trained under stricter discipline. Military training has been provided in the schools, and the growing strength of the militaristic element has added to the peril of Russia's neighbors.

NORTHERN BAPTISTS PAY INTERCHURCH UNDERWRITING. The General Board of Promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention has paid all of its $2,500,000 underwriting of the Interchurch World Movement, with interest. It was the first of the denominations with an underwriting of $1,000,000 or more to discharge its obligation in full.

ACCUSES FEDERAL OFFICIALS IN COAL DEALS. George H. Cushing, head of the American Wholesale Coal Association, charged in testimony before the Senate Committee on Reconstruction that government officials, profiting by advance information, were able to make large profits by speculating in bituminous coal. Names were withheld, but he asserted that one deal a group of officials made $675,000 profit. Another witness testified that War Department officials last fall had insisted on buying 1,000,000 tons of coal at once, and fixed a maximum price of $11 a ton, when by waiting the coal could have been obtained at $4 a ton or less.

AVIATORS SET ANOTHER RECORD. Records for a single-motor airplane endurance flight were broken when an army machine equipped with a 400-horse-power Liberty motor remained aloft continuously for eighteen hours and four minutes, and was forced to descend because of a leaky gasoline pipe.

D'ANNUNZIO CONTINUES TO DEFY ITALY. Gabrielle d'Annunzio, in reply to an ultimatum from the Italian General Caviglia, demanding the disbandment of his Fiume forces and the surrender of his territories, has announced his intention to resist the Italian forces and to persist in opposing the Treaty of Rapallo. The Italians hoped to compel d'Annunzio's surrender by enforcing a strict blockade against him, and thus avoid bloodshed.

BRAZIL GREETES SECRETARY COLBY. Bainbridge Colby, American Secretary of State, who is making visits of state to several South American countries, received an enthusiastic welcome in Rio de Janeiro, and the Guanabara Palace, once the home of the Emperor Dom Pedro, was set aside for the use of the mission. The Brazilians were eager to manifest extreme friendliness for the United States and to foster unity of purpose between North and South American countries.

REPARATIONS SETTLEMENT NEARER. Discussions between Allied and German delegates in Brussels at the second financial conference have cleared the atmosphere somewhat, by revealing Germany's ability to pay, and the assistance which the Allies must give to Germany in order that their demands may be met. The conference will be resumed January 10.

IRISH HOME RULE BILL PASSED. The Irish Home Rule measure, as amended by the House of Lords, was passed by the House of Commons and awaited only the royal signature to become law. Disorders throughout Ireland continued, and there were several serious clashes between the Sinn Fein and the Crown forces.

GREEK PREMIER RESIGNS. Premier Rhallis of Greece has tendered his resignation, according to reports from Athens, because of the refusal by the head of the British Naval Mission of a Greek decoration offered to him. The Allied ministers were expected to leave Athens soon because of opposition to King Constantine's return to the throne.

At the University of Moscow the students, young and old, men and women, must spend at least one hour a day in military drill—which is scarcely in accord with the pacific declarations of the Reds. Note the front rank, which includes an aged man and two young women

DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON'S

New Book, Just Published

1 Volume, 12 Mo., Large, Clear Type, Cloth Binding

Margaret Sangster says:

"When the name of Doctor Charles M. Sheldon, editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald, is printed on the cover of a book, the reader is assured of a good, solid literary ability, of a sunny sense of humor, and of more than a bit of inspiration. The Christian Herald, in announcing the publication of Dr. Sheldon's newest book, feels that it is giving a splendid treat to the people who love a good worthwhile fiction.

"Heart Stories" is a collection of seven interesting tales, six of which never have been published before and all now published for the first time in book form. There are stories of college and of affairs of state; of the trials of a young minister and of the struggles of business men. There are stories in which youth fights the good fight, there are stories of near failure, and there are stories of love.

"All of the seven stories will prove profitable reading."

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THAT the influence and numerical strength of the Prayer League are steadily growing is evident from the increased number of letters received every week, no less than from their wide territorial range and the larger variety of requests for prayer that are submitted to the League. It is always the case in times of trouble and anxiety, when a nation is passing through a period of trial, that the people in far larger proportion than usual, turn to the only Source of help for relief. Prayers for those who have fallen away from the Church and whose faith has declined; for those who have become engulfed in the whirl of pleasure and worldly excitement; and especially for those who seem to have lost their hold on God, are received in larger number than usual at such times.

Mrs. W. H. B., Dayton, O., writes: "On October 7 I made a request for prayer, as I was entering a hospital to take radium treatment for a large cancer, with doctors giving me no hope. After six weeks, examination showed that the cancer had disappeared, and although I shall be watched very closely by the physicians, yet I firmly believe that the Great Physician has heard and answered the many prayers for my recovery. Every one feels that a miracle has been performed. We are rejoicing and thanking God. It is surely His will, as our prayers were always 'Thy will be done.' I would like to send a word of encouragement to others suffering with this dreaded disease."

W. W., New York, requests prayers for a minister who has been very successful both as a pastor and evangelist in the past, that he may be led of the Spirit to a people who are willing to receive one who must, because of affliction in the family, come alone; and who desires only the preaching of the Gospel as proclaimed by the Apostle Paul, believing it to be only refuge and comfort for sin-battered and sin-tossed souls.

A young man in Chicago, Ill., writes: "All for God or all for Satan? It will ultimately be one or the other, for there can be no middle ground for me. I am a young newspaper man with literary hopes and aspirations, and with three great problems to solve, so I'm asking all who pray to ask my God to make His will very clear to me."

Mrs. A. W. S. asks the prayers of the members that a condition of poverty brought upon the family by adverse circumstances may be overcome.

Mrs. S. F. C., Tacoma Park, D. C., writes: "Pray for me that in so many months of awful suffering my faith will not fail me. I am alone; all my dear ones have passed away."

"All my life I have feared God rather than loved Him," writes M. L. P., San Antonio. "I want the prayers of the League that love may overcome fear and that I may have the peace and spiritual blessings that I so long for. Please pray that I may be restored to health, for I have been sick many years, and that I may be forgiven my sins."

Rev. W. R. Gray of the Greenwood Baptist Church, Harrison, Tenn., writes: "I take pleasure in telling you of our Prayer League. We meet twice a month in prayer and worship and are gaining ground. We still desire your prayers that we may be a power for our blessed Lord."

Prayers are earnestly requested for a mother in Rock Hill, S. C., who is afflicted with skin trouble, and for her youngest son, a veteran of the war, who is thoughtless in his treatment of her.

We have received acknowledgments of answered prayers from the following: C. W. G., Mrs. J. W. K., M. B. H., Mrs. Q. F. L., Mrs. S. E. I., M. K. F., M. E. I., P. K., I. H. and Mother, Mrs. G. B., J. C. W., C. T., and Reader, Iowa.

Among the individual requests, we have received 150 for healing; for the conversion of relatives and friends, 96; financial aid, 25; faith, 20; forgiveness, 5; wisdom, 17; courage, 6; peace, 9; guidance, 16; reunion, 8; spiritual advancement, 12; and success, 4.

E. L. I John 2:15-17

MATERIALISM, while it has many expositions and forms of expressing itself, may be summed up by the word "Worldliness." "Love not the world," we are commanded in our reference. Worldliness believes in the bread and butter doctrine, and its philosophy is "eat, drink and be merry" and its exponents never rise above the level of things seen. They are living in and for time to the utter neglect of eternity and its values. A recent writer has called this "horizontal living" and he urges for the living of the "perpendicular life." Mankind, instead of looking down, should look up.

The opposite to material living is spiritual living. God is included in the life of the spiritually minded individual. The Church is an important item in the scheme of things. Ideals and ideas for the betterment of humanity are stressed. Immortality is believed in as the chief aim of man. Not to include God, the Church, worship and service, reduces the individual in the scale of being. To neglect the spiritual reduces man to the lowest level of thought and endeavor. Materialism, when given its way with men, will reverse progress and man will go backward toward the pagan rather than forward to the Christian idea of things. The result will be spiritual wreck and moral bankruptcy. History will repeat itself as in the fall of Rome, the French Revolution and the World War. A Godless race spells ruin and despair, and ruin and despair are the outcome of materialism that puts God last and self first.

Self-Control. How to Get It: Its Rewards

C. E. and B. Y. P. U.

PAUL is our teacher. "I keep my body under." This means temperance in all things. Appetite, passion, speech, patience, are some of the elements of self-control. Self-control makes for the well-balanced life, sanity of thinking and normal habits, clean speech and system in conducting one's daily life, together with prayer and a Scripture reading, doing the things that are right whether we like to do them or not, scorning the path of least resistance, choosing the upward path of the stiff climb and endurance, are the creators of self-control. He who has learned how to control self, has won the right to success and leadership.

Tennyson said: "Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control, these three alone lead life to sovereign power." Shakespeare in Henry V says: "Self-love, my liege, is not so vile a sin as self-neglecting." "Man, know thyself," said Young, "all wisdom centers there." And Longfellow said:

"He that respects himself is safe from others.

He wears a coat of mail that none can pierce."

Self-control means a healthy mind, body and soul. It is evidence of a well-informed, a clean living and a praying life. One of the greatest evidences of the Christian life is self-control. "He that ruleth his own spirit is greater than he that taketh a city."

Is your blood pressure normal?

ALMOST daily you hear from some friend or acquaintance that he or she is suffering from high blood pressure. It is not a disease, but it is a symptom of a condition of the blood vessels that, if neglected, may lead to serious or even fatal results. The arteries, which carry the blood from the heart all over the body, are elastic, like a thin rubber tube. So, when the force pump action of the heart is suddenly increased by violent physical exercise, or severe mental or nervous exertion or strain, the arteries expand and thus accumulate the extra quantity of blood pumped into them.

Failure to properly digest food, or to eliminate its waste regularly and thoroughly, favors the absorption into the blood of irritating or poisonous matter, which if allowed to continue, hardens the arterial walls, and causes them to lose elasticity and become rigid and brittle. The blood current is impeded, causing high blood pressure, the heart enlarges, and the kidneys and liver become diseased.

Leading medical authorities agree that the best way to prevent or overcome high blood pressure is to cut down flesh foods and insure regular, thorough bowel evacuation.

For the latter they prescribe Nujol, as it is most efficient and safe.

Nujol relieves constipation without any unpleasant or weakening effects. It does not upset the stomach. It does not cause nausea or griping, nor interfere with the day's work or play.

Instead of forcing or irritating the system, Nujol simply softens the food waste. This enables the many tiny muscles in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to squeeze the food waste along so that it passes naturally out of the system.

Nujol actually prevents constipation because it helps Nature maintain easy, thorough bowel evacuation at regular intervals—the healthiest habit in the world.

Nujol is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take. Try it.

Where Are Your Savings Going?

ARE your savings going into haphazard speculation? Are they going into low-interest-yielding depositories? Neither of these methods of making your money bear you a return is the way for a modern and wise man to invest the results of his labor and his thrift.

The safest investment in the world is a mortgage. For fifty-one years we have specialized in First Mortgage 6% Notes on improved property in Washington, D. C., and in the first eight months of the present year we have financed 32.8% of all new buildings in Washington, the nation's home town. These Notes are offered in denominations of from $100 to $100,000. They are short term maturities, and are safeguarded by careful appraisals, supervision and examination. Real Estate in the Nation's Capital is so remarkably stable and conservative that even the troubled days of war never reduced the value of our First Mortgage 6% Notes below par.

E. B. N., Cohoes, N. Y., writes asking: "Can one be a Christian who serves God in the church one day in seven, and closes his ears and eyes to avoid seeing opportunities to do a kindness to the sick or needy, the rest of the week?" Such a life would be very far from the real standard of Christianity. We are told, however, not to judge others, and there is always danger in doing so. There are many really good people who love to do their alms in secret, and who hide their good works from the sight of men. We have known some whose charities and kind deeds were unknown even to their nearest neighbors, and it would have been a great error to have judged them simply by the world's estimate. God alone, who knows the heart of man, is the judge.

M. J. H. M., Fremont, O., writes: "I enjoy the Christian Herald more and more each year and must have it. Our local W. C. T. U. ladies are deeply interested in the moral welfare of our young people, also their health. The way women dress now is not only a disgrace to our sex but degenerating to the race and breaking down the health of our women. It is useless to spend millions to check tuberculosis unless there is a national movement for dress reform, and also against the present style of dancing." The writer of this letter enclosed resolutions adopted by the W. C. T. U. of North Dakota "deploring the lowering of moral standards by immodest dress, the modern dance, and unwholesome moving-picture shows," and pledging its influence to correct these evils in our modern social life. The national organization, 500,000 strong, is preparing for a movement along these lines.

Rev. J. W. McKean, missionary of the American Sunday School Union at Fresno, Calif., writes us telling how Thanksgiving was spent this year in his home: "It has been the custom for some years for several families to get together both on Thanksgiving and Christmas, and by each family furnishing part of the dinner, all to have a feast and a good time. This year, after attending a Union service in one of the big churches, we met in my home, where we had dinner. Turkey was too expensive for us, but we had other good things and felt very thankful. After dinner we sang a number of the good old songs, while daughter played the accompaniment. Then I read the sermon on 'Through and Nevertheless' in the Thanksgiving number of the Christian Herald, and called on each one present to tell some things he or she had to be thankful for. Each responded and some very interesting things were said. We closed the service with prayer, and all felt that we had had a really good day. Personally I am very thankful to some unknown friend who has been sending me the Christian Herald for many years, and has it paid up now to August, 1922. If persons who are able to do so, could just know how much joy and help they could send into homes where the people are poor by sending the Herald to them, every home in the whole country would have this splendid paper. I get much help and encouragement from the Herald. God bless it."

N. H. T., Templeman's Cross Roads, Va. 1. Matt. 13: 24-30 has been so widely discussed that it has become familiar to most readers. The good and bad both grow together until the harvest, until which no attempt is to be made to effect a separation. One commentator here remarks: "To stretch this so far as to justify allowing openly scandalous persons to remain in the communion of the Church, is to wrest the teaching of the parable to other than its proper design and go in the teeth of apostolic injunction (1 Cor. 5 chap.)." 2. The passage in Matt. 18: 18 is generally interpreted as having to do with admission to and rejection from church membership.

"Troubled Spirit," New Haven, Conn. The ultimate purpose or result of an act may be of far greater moment than the act itself. If the spiritual welfare of the members of your household depends upon the change you propose to make—and about which you have apparently reached a final decision—you should ask for a blessing on your plans and then go ahead. The matter of the trifling expense, or the source of defraying it, is not comparable with the larger question involved. Do your best and the way out will become clear to you as you proceed.

Rev. C. R. Jones, Mills Memorial Baptist Church, Mayville, Mich., writes us calling attention to a typographical error in our issue of December 4, in discussing Romans 6: 3, 4. The expression "baptism unto Jesus Christ and unto his death," should have read "into" in both cases.

Reader, Minn., writes: "I am a Christian and my Saviour is very dear to me; but I find it very hard to witness for Him, especially in my home. It is not because I don't want to, but there never seems to be an occasion for it. The rest of the family have not taken any stand for Christ. I shall be thankful for any helpful suggestion for lifting Him up so that they may all find Him."

We must not always look for appreciation by others of our own attitude on spiritual things. And it frequently happens that one's worst critics are those of his own household. (See Matt. 10: 32; Luke 12: 8; Rev. 3: 5; also Matt. 13: 58.)

J. N. W., Jewett, O. In a recent paragraph we should have added the name of Seth (Gen. 5: 3) as one of the three sons of Adam whose names are given in Scripture.

A. C. N., Red Hook, N. Y. If we accept as true the statement that the body is designed to be the temple of the Holy Spirit, then it should surely be our duty to keep that temple clean and pure and free from practices or indulgences that would in any degree make it unworthy of such a guest.

M. C. L., Oswegatchie, N. Y. The ancients had a saying: "Whom the gods love, die young." Death comes to all alike, and while it is especially sad when it takes away one who has just begun to give evidence of real usefulness to the world, we must accept the visitation with faith in God, and with assurance that our friend has not lived in vain. The wisdom of the world gives us no consolation in such a case; but the Word of God assures us that the death of the righteous need never be a cause for doubting the Divine goodness. His memory, with those who knew him, will remain, as a sweet and fragrant recollection. An old hymn expresses this idea:

"Take comfort, Christians, when your friends
In Jesus fall asleep;
Their better being never ends,
Then why dejected weep?"

See Psalms 112: 6; and 118: 20; Proverbs, 14: 32; Isaiah 3: 10; Matt. 13: 43.

Reader, Williamsburg, Ia. You must pray for faith in God that you may be led to believe His promises. (Matt. 17: 20; Rom. 4: 5; 11 Cor. 5: 7; Jas. 1: 6; Jas. 5: 15.) If in your church relationships you can take counsel with some godly woman who is experienced in Christian work, and join her activities, you will find it a great stimulus to faith. Talk with her frankly concerning your own lack of faith, and she will help you to a better understanding. There is nothing like active Christian service to banish one's doubts and fears.

A. M. W., Beaver, Okla. The purification of politics, like the cleansing of the Augean stables by Hercules, must begin at the bottom. You are quite right when you say that "as a rule, the so-called practical politician looks after the 'loaves and fishes,' and not after men and principles." A great movement sweeps through a nation, but it has always its beginnings in small groups of right-minded citizens, who have worked faithfully within their own limited circle, long before the movement gathered strength on a larger scale. All great reforms move slowly, although, when the field has become ripe for the harvest, it is reaped sometimes with amazing swiftness. It was so with anti-slavery, prohibition and other big reforms, and it will be so with those that are yet undeveloped. Individuals, communities and churches must all be set in motion before any statewide or national success can be looked for; but if the founders have faith in God, the results will come if not in their time, then to those who come to take up the work after them.

OH, MONEY! MONEY!

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

"If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the key-note of Mrs. Porter's story. Stanley Fulton, a bachelor with only dollars for companionship, begins to wonder what will become of his twenty millions when he dies. In order to test in advance his only relatives—three distant cousins whom he has never seen—he decides to give them each one hundred thousand dollars and then appear among them as plain John Smith and watch the result of his experiment. How the money was spent by the different families, bringing joy and a wholesome life to some, and only sorrow to others, and how "John Smith" himself learns a needed lesson and finds a wife, is told in this book.

Into countless thousands of homes, the novels of Eleanor H. Porter have come as harbingers of sunshine and gladness: Wherever the English language is spoken, men and women have grown to recognize her supreme gift as an interpreter of the happy heart of childhood. As one woman wrote from a little mountain village in Kentucky, "More than any one else, Mrs. Porter gives back to us the joy of knowing that this is a beautiful world."

Readi-Cut HOMES

Built for $1000 Less

30% Saved on Labor—18% Saved on Lumber

This is the pleasant and satisfying experience of Mr. C. M. Hissong, of La Grange, Indiana, who recently wrote as follows: "I am the owner of an Aladdin Readi-cut house, the Plaza, and I am certainly more than satisfied.

The carpenters in this place—those who did not help me as well as those who did—said they never saw better material. I have worked a great deal at carpentering myself and I know I never before worked such fine material—not a crooked or twisted piece in the lot. Everything was cut-to-fit and went together without a hitch, and this saving in time was a big item. Two others and myself put up the frames, sheathed the entire building and put on the shingles in 14 days. I know I saved over $1000 by buying an Aladdin Readi-cut house instead of buying at home. If I were to build either one or a hundred houses they would all be Readi-cut and bought of the Aladdin Company."

We have thousands of letters from satisfied owners of Aladdin Readi-cut Homes who have had the same experience as Mr. Hissong. No matter where you live there is an Aladdin Readi-cut owner near you to whom we will gladly refer.

is really an apartment that separated itself from other apartments and became a house by itself. The desirable features of both the apartment and the detached home are combined in the Aladdinette. The convenience of properly arranged, expertly proportioned rooms which are typical of the apartment, together with the privacy of the detached home and freedom of yard and lawns, constitute the features that make for the popularity of the Aladdinette.

There are many individual designs of Aladdinettes—something to please each individual requirement in size, style and price. And the amount you would have to pay for rent this year and next will more than pay for the entire cost of one of these most desirable homes. By the use of a modern kitchenette, wasteful dining room space is eliminated. By the use of Murphy wall beds, floor space serves a double purpose.

We have prepared a special illustrated booklet, showing many different designs of Aladdinettes which we will be glad to send upon application. Ask for Aladdinette Book No. 137.

The Near-East Tangle

The Christian Peoples Face Extinction While the Civilized World Offers No Help

By LEE VROOMAN

IT WAS said some months ago of the situation in the Near East that most anything might happen, but probably it wouldn't. That remark can now be amended to say that most anything may happen and that probably it will. The Near East has been the scene of six heart-rending winters, but unless some miracle occurs it is now facing the winter of greatest misery of all.

Why all this? In October, 1918, we were told that the Turks had surrendered to the Allies and that the rebuilding of the country would begin at once. Today the last remnants of the Christian races seem threatened with extinction and the countries of the civilized world either show indifference or admit their inability to aid.

This is because the Turks of Asia Minor have sworn to resist the Allies to the last drop of blood. Facing this the Allies have not been able to unite on any program to crush them. No unity of thought or action has been shown anywhere.

But if one expects to find a consistent picture in the Near East he will be disappointed. In one place we find Greek fighting Turk; in another, Greek merchant boats carrying supplies to the Turks. While the French were fighting the Turks and enlisting thousands of Armenians and Greeks under their flag for that purpose, they were championing the cause of the Turks in the Peace Conference. French and Italian concerns are accused of selling arms to the forces of Mustapha Kemal Pasha.

Even among the native races we find this same lack of uniformity. Hadjin and Marash in Cilicia have recently seen the old sport of Armenian massacre, but in Urfa not many miles to the east the Armenians and Moslems have never been so friendly in the history of the city. As for the Kurds, in population the second Moslem race of Asia Minor, some are pro-Ally, some are pro-Turk.

Even for the Turks this is theoretically a civil war. The Sultan has signed the Peace Treaty, the forces of Mustapha Kemal Pasha have revolted against him. The government of the Sultan professes to be as anxious for his defeat as are Lloyd George and Minierand.

BUT for all practical purposes we must clearly understand that Mustapha with his party is Turkey. Excepting European Turkey, and the Mediterranean, Dardanelles, Bosphorus coast line, he controls Turkey. He has sworn he will resist all Allied interference in Turkish affairs; will drive the French out of Cilicia, the Greeks out of Smyrna, and the Allies out of Constantinople. All of which he may or may not do.

To place him and his position we ought to try to get a bird's-eye view of this troubled and complicated territory, even if we have to hear several discouragingly long names.

Constantinople and the coast lines nearby are controlled by the Sultan and his pro-Ally party. By propaganda he is trying to undermine the Nationalists. But his military strength is nil and he would not last a week were it not for the presence of the Allied armies of occupation.

Syria and Cilicia the French are attempting to control but are having constant warfare with the Turks and Arabs. In Mesopotamia the British fight the Arab and Kurdish tribesmen continually. European Turkey the Greeks captured only a few months ago.

The Caucasus has been crushed by the Bolsheviki and the Turks, who now rule there together. Thus the Bolsheviki have joined forces with the Turks, not because of love, but because they will aid all forces opposed to the Allies. When the Turks and Russians invaded the Caucasus all the Near East Relief workers were given an opportunity to go. Another star was added to America's record when every single worker decided to stay with the job. These Americans at last reports were absolutely cut off from communication with the outside world.

Getting into outlying but important regions we find the Trans-Caucasus Turcomans and Tatars now free from Russia and quite restless. In fact Enver Pasha is reputed to be with them, still following his Pan-Turanian star. Although Persia and Egypt are under the control of Great Britain they are far from content with their lot.

German ammunition going to Mustapha Kemal's army

OF ALL these elements of discord and mutual hatreds, the strongest Moslem force is Turkey. And the task to which the Turkish leader, Mustapha Kemal Pasha, has set himself is the task of welding all these diverse races from the Sahara to Thibet into a great anti-foreign movement held together by the Moslem religion. His propaganda agents are in all Mohammedan countries pressing his claims, going to the length of setting up the Amir of Afghanistan as the new head of the Moslem religion in the place of the Allied-controlled leader in Constantinople.

All these Moslem races met at Baku some weeks ago with the Bolsheviki to talk over plans for Pan-Islam and Bolshevik expansion. The Moslems are working for Pan-Islam, and that only, no matter how much they may camouflage by using Bolshevik titles. These two forces will work together as long as faced by common enemies in western Europe, but no longer.

For finance Kemal claims the Bolsheviki have loaned him some Russian gold and unlimited paper money. He has also adopted the habit of paying his officers in wheat, which he collects in lieu of taxes. For munitions he has the ammunition left by the Germans in 1918, some bought recently, and Bolshevik arms.

Mustapha Kemal Pasha is said to be a Salonica Moslem Jew. Little is known of his history. But he has gathered around him the keenest of the Young Turk leadership that served under Enver Pasha during the war. These men give him loyal support. He has driven the Allied armies of occupation from the greater part of Asia Minor during the past year.

A man that could do this must be given consideration when he announces that he will do still more.

WHAT he considers to be his sources of strength were outlined to me last summer by his cousin, the governor of Harpoot. The chief factor on which he is resting is the lack of unity among the Allies, and their dislike for an extensive military campaign in Asia Minor. An old Turkish proverb says, "While the Christian dogs quarrel among themselves, we grow fat." And that seems to be as true now as it always has been.

His huge territory with practically no roads gives him that same advantage for defensive warfare that Russia has. His soldiers are used to mountain warfare, and will fight with bread for food and rags for uniforms. Turks are used to doing what they are told. So the ragged, underfed, unpaid peasants from the hills will keep going as long as their officers lead them. As an invading army advances against these troops it must bring its supplies over mountain wastes with long lines of communication. The truth is that the Greeks who were given the task of subduing him captured only the fringe of the country.

Finally he holds the remnants of the Armenians, Syrians, and Greeks as hostages. One word from him and they would all be massacred in a day. By using them as pawns he hopes to gain concessions.

But it must not be thought by any means that Mustapha Kemal Pasha has everything his own way.

Of course he lacks the support of his subject Christian races. His chief weakness lies in the war weariness of the population of the whole Near-East. The average villager or city merchant wants only to be left alone and has little sympathy with the Nationalist motto of "fight to the last drop of blood." Should a strong Turkish leadership opposed to Mustapha show itself his whole kingdom might go down like a pack of cards. Besides the difficulty he has drafting troops and raising funds from among the Turks he has to face the open hostility of many of the Moslem tribesmen, Kurds and Circassians. In fact, this summer Circassians captured and held for some time the city of Yozgat, a few miles from Angora, the capital in central Asia Minor.

The Kurds around Harpoot in Eastern Asia Minor lately ordered this very cousin of Mustapha to resign and leave, which he did at once. In regions where the Kurds form a large percentage of the population the local Turks have kept all their troops at home for self-protection and refused to send any levies to the front.

All over his territory anarchy is becoming more and more general. Trade is at a standstill. Murder and robbery are common occurrences everywhere. The government has little control over the primitive villagers. The whole country is disintegrating.

A final cause of weakness is the difficulty of communication with the outlying lands under his control. This makes it hard for him to keep a firm grip over his own people. The pro-Ally and pro-Peace Treaty Sultan is thus given opportunity to carry on propaganda opposed to the Nationalist movement.

RECENTLY has come the downfall of Venizelos in Greece, and then an alliance with Bolsheviks. These two things will increase tremendously the prestige of Mustapha Kemal Pasha at home. Difficulties of transportation, however, make it unlikely that many Bolshevik troops actually will fight in Anatolia. But gold and gunpowder, the two essentials of war, will probably come.

Armenia is crushed. France openly wants to admit defeat and make peace with Mustapha. Greece will not be able to carry on more than a defensive warfare. The United States displays indifference to the whole tragedy. This leaves England as the only force likely actively to oppose the Nationalists. I firmly believe if the English would stick for some time more and carry on, through the Sultan, wise propaganda, the insurgent Turks would eventually go to pieces.

A scene in a typical Turkish village. In the group in the foreground, the man with the white headdress is a Turkish priest, next to him is a government official, and the others are army officers

It seems, however, as if some compromise will be attempted by the League of Nations which will scrap the original peace treaty. I doubt if this will succeed, due to the impossible demands the Turks will make. What will be the outcome no one can foretell. But in any case the hopes held by the Christian races in 1918 for their future protection will never be realized.

How will all this affect the American missions? At present most of the missionaries are devoting their efforts to relief work in co-operation with the Near-East Relief. When they start in full-time mission work again they will really be starting anew, and can easily undertake new methods to meet new needs.

The greater part of the missionary effort of the past century has been devoted to the Christian races of the Near-East with wonderful results. But, except along tions must be devoted almost entirely to Moslems. The men and women on the field recognize this. At Caesarea plans are being laid for work among both the Turks and Circassians. Around Harpoot, Kurds make up the majority of the population, and for them plans also are being made. The great material equipment, the prestige, and experience gained by one hundred years' work will not be abandoned. The adaptable American missionaries will divert them to new peoples, hard to reach before but mellowed now.

The Moslem races can be reached now as never before. The Kurds of Harpoot have asked that missionary work be done among them. The Circassians of the Caucasus have also asked for missionaries. Every Turk I ever talked with always came around to the idea that the Turkey of the future would have to be patterned after America if they were to enter the family of nations. Their old supercilious haughtiness is gone. If we can bring to them the best of our Christianity, they will accept it.

American missionaries there have a tremendous prestige. Men and women like Mr. Riggs, Miss Graffam, Dr. Shephard, Miss Cushman, Mr. Beach, and Miss Fenanga are the greatest forces tending for law and order that we find in Turkey today.

Through that whole region of hates and counterhates only one nationality enjoys the confidence of all parties—the American. Our relief workers and missionaries come and go when Turks themselves do not dare travel. Be it Arab or Armenian, Azerbaijan or British, French or Georgian, Circassian or Greek, Kurd or Persian, Syrian or Turk, who happens to control the government temporarily, except for occasional troubles, they all render every aid to our citizens. So should Mustapha Kemal Pasha succeed, or should he fail, with his far-reaching scheme for a new Holy War, doubtless the only people to see it from the inside will be Americans.

The Church's Duty Toward the Alien

By RICHARD D. LA GUARDIA

A COMPARISON of the new map of the world with that of 1913 shows an amazing shifting of borders and the creation of many young nations. This means that there are developing increasing numbers of new restrictions and new freedoms, the effects of which are becoming very evident to us here in America through the incoming tide of immigration.

According to recent reports, 454,119 immigrants have arrived in the United States since January 1, 1920. They are quite distinctive from the immigrants of previous years, because they bring with them from the new Old World across the water special needs which create a different atmosphere in this country and demand a more up-to-date program of assimilation than that meted out formerly.

The need that is so vitally evident among newly arrived immigrants is Christian Americanization, and the organization that is uniquely equipped to fill this is the Protestant Church. It is plain from the number of foreigners who have come here to make a name for themselves, sincere and well-meaning, and who have failed disgracefully, finding themselves either in prison or being deported, that until Christianization as well as Americanization enters into our dealing with the immigrant we are going to fail in our relations and understanding with him. The need of a Christian realization in the hearts and minds of these men is even more important than presenting them with their first and second papers.

It is an unchallengeable fact that at least the greater proportion of our Protestant congregations are in heartfelt sympathy with these foreign-born brethren of ours, and sufficient and enthusiastic volunteers can always be secured from the Church to take a personal and active part in the betterment and uplift.

THE things that a church can do after securing such volunteers are too numerous to mention, but just briefly I will describe a few. Church members can quite easily get in touch with the foreigners who are members of their own faith. The creating and encouraging of foreign missions and the "boosting" of them by frequent visits from Americans will help extensively. In no case, however, should any attempt be made to proselyte or to discriminate against the foreigner of a different faith, as this makes for most unfortunate and unexpected results. But if the immigrant feels a man or woman is giving his or her spare time without any compensation or without a double motive he responds immediately, and the first step toward Christian Americanization is well taken.

Do not hesitate to invite the foreigner to your church on special occasions; let your church become the center for Americanization. If it is too small for such activities, unite with other churches in your community. Create an Americanization Committee and study the immigrants' problems help them to solve these by the message of Christ as well as by that of the Constitution of the United States.

The appeal for Americanization knocks at the door of each of us, regardless of what our individual lives may be. The Church and its members should realize our responsibility in the matter more clearly than any others, for the story of the Good Samaritan is fresh in mind. And the Church holds in its hands the power of securing and maintaining unity, loyalty, and efficiency. As soon as the Church assumes its leadership, it will take a firm stand in this work, and what is now considered a burden will then be called a privilege, a God-sent blessing. It is then that the nation, as a whole, will see that this service has been long neglected, in some cases even despised. Through the efforts of the Church and its members there are large possibilities of transforming any doubtful city into one of the safest, most-loyal and dependable cities in the country.

It is up to the churches and their members to maintain the ideals of our country. With their help every foreigner will realize that America is indeed the land of the free and the land of opportunity. They, better than any one else, can teach the newcomer why America possesses great economic advantages and how he may become as privileged a citizen as any American-born, if only he regards our laws. May it be the Church—every church—that welcomes the immigrant who comes to us clean, healthy, industrious and ready to uphold the ideals of true Americanism.

A Church "Always Open"

It Must Be to Thrive in New York's Amusement District

By HENRY CLAY FOSTER

ABOUT the long narrow X formed by Broadway crossing Seventh Avenue, known as Times Square, the amusement center of New York, lies the parish of Union Methodist Episcopal Church. Through the years in which it was building up to pre-eminence in the field of theatrical attractions, old Union Church itself on West 48th Street was ministering to an ever diminishing congregation. In the downtown center, where hundreds of thousands of people came daily and other hundreds of thousands nightly, there seemed little prospect of success for a church. And save old Union there has been no Protestant church in that locality for years.

The challenge of such conditions as confronted old Union caused the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, operating with Centenary funds, to try to demonstrate what an adequately equipped church could do. If the church was to survive, it had to meet the competition. Every other enterprise thereabouts goes at full blast day and night, and on this basis the church had to take its part.

A word more about the neighborhood. On the side streets off Broadway, east and west, stand countless boarding-houses, in which live the vast floating population common to every downtown amusement neighborhood, especially about the hotels, theaters and moving-picture shows. In the various hotels of the immediate parish 42,000 strangers register daily. Travelers—transients—everywhere. And in all the busy life there was apparently no place for religious activities.

Such was the condition previous to last June. No things are changed. It is still a church in the truest sense of the word. On Sunday the simple evangelistic appeal and the regular functions of Methodist churches everywhere are carried on with zeal and enthusiasm. The auditorium seating five hundred is filled to capacity. People come down to the altar and souls are saved as in churches all over the country. On one Sunday night in December fourteen young men and women answered the invitation to accept Christ, and joined the church. On Sunday the message of the Christ is delivered. There are no bizarre or grotesque aspects. The minister in charge, Rev. John G. Benson, resorts to no freaks to attract a crowd of curious hearers. And the membership of the church has been trebled in six months.

And yet where there were few people in the past there are now many. Why? Therein lies the tale.

OLD Union is now functioning, not only on Sunday morning, afternoon and evening, but throughout the twenty-four hours, not only on the Sabbath, but throughout the week. There is always something going on. In that way the motion-picture shows and various revues of Broadway have nothing on the church around the corner. Only at the church everything is done with the idea of service and with no thought of gain.

Union church building has been overhauled, and every available square foot of space utilized for some specific purpose in keeping with the new program. Space hitherto unused was made into a dormitory accommodating twenty-two young men, two-thirds of whom have joined the church, some of whom are ushers, and are on the official board. Two houses next door have been purchased and remodelled into a dormitory for sixty girls, with a waiting list of over a hundred. Endowed beds are always in readiness for any girl without funds who comes for aid.

The activities at Union Church have been carefully organized after a study of neighborhood conditions. The most unusual of these is the Social Clinic, which meets a desperate need in the parish. It is simply a time and a place where persons who have any kind of problem can find a Christian friend to whom in implicit confidence they can tell their problems and get advice that is free from any selfish purpose whatsoever.

Every afternoon and evening the whole staff, including the pastor, is ready for consultation, and hundreds of people make their way to this place of friendship and counsel.

"The terrific problem of my parish," said Dr. Benson, "is loneliness. I have noticed one thing about Broadway as I have studied it—the surprising number of people who are talking to themselves. The great need of thousands is that of a friend to talk to. The people who come to me, and I see as many as twenty-five in an afternoon and evening, do not ask money. Most of them wish to give money. It is for help in meeting their thorny problems or unravelling the tangles of life."

IN DR. BENSON'S office there are two railroad tickets from the East to the Far West, which were purchased nineteen years ago, but never used. They are kept as mementos of a striking piece of the usefulness of the clinic which occurred a few weeks after it was opened.

A man came in to the parlor one day and said he had been carrying something on his heart for years which had become too heavy and must be unburdened. The story in brief is this: Nineteen years ago his associate in business was guilty of larceny in such a way that suspicion and responsibility fell upon this man. He was young, and very foolishly decided to run rather than face the situation, and while he had not taken any money, he did take two railroad tickets. Leaving his wife and family he went into a Pacific Coast state. From there he went to Alaska and made considerable money, and then returned to the Pacific Coast, where he entered business and prospered, being elected to the State Legislature, and serving one term as Circuit Judge. He used an assumed name. Later he moved to New York, still haunted by the separation from his family and the loss of his reputation at home.

Investigation was made by the pastor. He discovered that the man who took the money had confessed twelve years before, and that there was no charge against this man. His wife was communicated with and they met one Sunday morning at Union Church for the first time in nineteen years. The man has become one of

A group of famine refugees huddled before their crude shelters, which afford only the scantiest of protection from the bitter cold of the North China winter

China's Need Grows More Intense

EFFORTS to relieve the sufferings of the many millions of Chinese in the five northern provinces affected by the present famine are being carried forward with unabated energy, but the need daily grows worse. Winter has set in, adding death by exposure to that by starvation.

We in America have experienced the first snowfall of the season. We shudder as we push against the north wind, warmly clad, and are very glad to reach our warm, comfortable, cheerful homes. A warm, hearty dinner awaits us, and we feel at peace with the world as we settle ourselves before the fire to read the evening paper.

The famine-stricken area in China has about the same sort of winter as our Middle Atlantic or Middle Western states. What are the conditions over there on the other side of the world, ten thousand miles away? Where the vegetation has not been entirely consumed by these poor, miserable starving people, "food" consists of a cake made from pressed leaves, grass and weeds, the chaff of the millet, and the bark of trees. The Chinese peasant uses for fuel the stalks of his crops, but this year even that poor means of providing heat is denied to the Chinese.

As for clothing, they have, as protection against the biting cold of Central Asia, only ragged garments. In the early summer, when the shortage of food first made itself felt, they sold their clothes, except what they were then wearing, to buy food where it was obtainable at that time.

AMERICA has always been not only ready but willing to help its less fortunate sister nations. It is inconceivable that she will not extend the helping hand to her sister republic in the Far East, now facing the most terrible calamity in its many centuries of history. Because of the many thousands of miles between us and the starving people we are apt to overlook the magnitude of the famine that has in its grip tens of millions. Conservative estimates from reliable sources place the number at 45,000,000, of which 10,000 are dying every day.

American farmers, according to figures recently issued by the Department of Agriculture, had broken all production records with half-a-dozen crops this year, and several other crops closely approached record proportions.

China has, therefore, ample reason to look for aid for its starving millions from the United States. The European countries have their own war-stricken millions to consider. America is the only country rich enough to give on a sufficiently large scale to avert the catastrophe. The noble work done in China by American missionaries has laid the foundation of an enduring friendship, and for generations the Chinese have placed their faith, hope and confidence in America.

Can we in our bounty and wealth afford not to help her now?

It requires, according to medical authorities in China, about three cents a day to feed a Chinese. Imagine the awfulness of a human being starving for the want of three cents' worth of food, not the price of two two-cent stamps!

A little schoolgirl, heeding the appeal of the Christian Herald in behalf of the famine sufferers gave as her contribution $1.50, the money she had saved for Christmas. Not content with giving her all, she collected money from the children in her school and sent $4.50 more. Now she has written to her friends to help this most worthy cause and her efforts to date have netted the fund $82, surely a wonderful, beautiful thing for a youngster not yet in her teens. We know that grown-ups will not allow themselves to be eclipsed in their contributions by a little tot of a girl.

CONTRIBUTIONS from readers of the Christian Herald have passed the $200,000 mark. The previous total as reported in our issue of January 8 was $162,486.64. Daily receipts since December 22 are:

" 24	6,215.03
" 27	16,834.50
" 28	4,862.59
" 29	8,403.04

From the beginning made by the Christian Herald to acquaint Americans with the terrible situation involving the 45,000,000 Chinese and to raise money for relief measures, the movement has assumed mammoth proportions. The undertaking has enlisted the support of public-spirited citizens in all parts of the country through the formation of the American Committee for China Famine Fund, consisting of 130 of the best-known people in the country, of which Thomas W. Lamont, of J. P. Morgan and Company, is chairman. An executive committee has been formed with Union N. Bethell, formerly president of the New York Telephone Company, as chairman, and Graham Patterson, publisher of the Christian Herald as vice-chairman. Headquarters of the American Committee have been established at Bible House in the Christian Herald quarters, where funds are being received for immediate transmission by cable through the State Department to the stricken area.

The International Famine Relief Committee has been formed in Peking to insure the proper and prompt use of the funds received from America. Immediately upon receipt of money, this committee arranges to purchase foodstuffs at points nearest to the famine regions and to see that the food is shipped promptly. Arrangements have been completed whereby the food shipped to the sufferers is distributed to the people most in need.

Many generous-hearted people have come forward with offers of grain and other foodstuffs to be shipped to the starving Chinese. It was intended to arrange for the collection of the corn, wheat and rice for shipment to a central port and so to China. Though we greatly appreciate the offers and the spirit in which they are made, recent developments have made it inadvisable to accept grain for forwarding to China just now. We are being compelled with reference to grain contributions offered to us in response to our suggestions of a few weeks ago, to ask all donors to hold their offers open for a brief period until a policy can be decided on which will be agreeable to the distributing agencies in China.

According to word received from the International Famine Relief Committee in Peking, grain is obtainable in Manchuria and transportation by railway into the famine districts permits of quick delivery. In view of this, we feel that it is very necessary that the maximum amount of money be placed in the hands of the International Committee in Peking so that grain can be purchased "on the spot," in that way securing a very considerable saving of time. Two months alone means the saving of 600,000 persons.

The fate of 45,000,000 people depends upon our help. America has never failed before and she surely will not fail to respond to the call in a disaster that transcends anything the world has ever seen.

THE governors of several states, acting on information supplied by the Christian Herald, have issued proclamations calling attention to the seriousness of the situation and requesting their people to contribute toward the alleviation of the suffering. That issued by Governor James M. Cox of Ohio reads as follows:

"At the request of the Christian Herald China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City, I desire to bring to the attention of the people of Ohio the terrible conditions now existing in China. Reports every day point to a growing field of suffering. Latest advices from Peking, from conservative sources, indicate that 10,000,000 people will die before spring unless relief in unprecedented quantities reaches them. The only way relief can be sent in measures large enough to count is to get the news of the situation directly to the people of America.

"I deem it a part of my duty to respond to this request. The Christian Herald China Famine Fund is the third of its kind in the last three decades. The appeal for help comes from native officials, and from American missionaries of all denominations. The fund has the endorsement of President Wilson, Secretary of State Colby, and of the American Red Cross. The money collected will be transmitted by cable through the State Department to various diplomatic and consular officials in China, where the relief will be administered by an interdenominational committee already organized. This committee will work in full accord with the international relief agencies already existing."

The proclamation issued by Governor J. A. A. Burnquist of Minnesota says:

"The five provinces of Northern China—Chihli, Shantung, Honan, Shansi and Shensi—are in the grip of what is said to be the most devastating famine in the world's history. Between 40,000,000 and 45,000,000 people are affected. It is the greatest tragedy facing humanity today, and the indications are that the suffering will continue with increasing loss of life until next summer. China herself is helpless. America is practically the only country that can furnish any relief.

"The Christian Herald of New York City, which has three times in the last two decades organized China famine funds, has again undertaken the task of raising a relief fund. This work has the endorsement of President Wilson, Secretary of State Colby and the American Red Cross. The State Department will transmit money by cable to American diplomatic and consular officers in China where the fund will be administered by an interdenominational committee already organized.

"Contributions may be sent to the Christian Herald China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York."

CHAPTER X

IT WAS Bennie who came first to the Settlement House. Shyly, almost, he slipped through the great doors—as one who seeks something that he does not quite understand. As he came a gray kitten, creeping out from the shadows of the hall, rubbed affectionately against his leg. And Bennie, half unconsciously—and with absolutely no recognition—stooped to pat its head.

Rose-Marie would have cried with joy to have seen him do it, but Rose-Marie was in another part of the building, teaching tiny children to embroider outlines with gay wool upon perforated bits of cardboard. The Young Doctor, passing by the half-opened door of the kindergarten-room, saw her there and paused, for a moment, to enjoy the sight. He thought, with a curious tightening of his lips, as he left noiselessly, that some day Rose-Marie would be surrounded by her own children—far away from the Settlement House. And he was surprised at the sick feeling that the thought gave him.

"I've been rather a fool," he told himself savagely, "trying to send her away. I've been a fool. But I'd never known anything like her—not in all of my life! And it makes me shiver to think of what one meeting with some unscrupulous gangster would do to her point of view. It makes me want to fight the world when I realize how one unpleasant experience would affect her love of people. I'd rather never see her again," he was surprised for a second time, at the pain that the words caused him, "than to have her made unhappy. I hope that this man of hers is a regular fellow!"

He passed on, down the hall. He walked slowly, the vision of Rose-Marie, a dream-child held close to her breast, before his eyes. That was why, perhaps, he did not see Bennie—why he stumbled against the boy.

"Hello," he said gruffly, for his voice was just a trifle hoarse (voices get that way, sometimes, when visions will stay in front of one's eyes!). "Hello, youngster! Do you want anything? Or are you just looking around?"

BENNIE straightened up. The kitten that he had been patting rubbed reassuringly against his legs, but Bennie needed more reassurance than the affection a kitten can give. The kindness of Rose-Marie, the stories that she had told him, had given him a great deal of confidence. But he had not yet learned to stand up, fearlessly, to a big man with a gruff voice. It is a step forward to have stopped hurting the smaller things. But to accept a pretty lady's assurance that things larger than you will be kind—that is almost too much to expect! Bennie answered just a shade shrinkingly.

"Th' kids in school," he muttered, "tol' me 'bout a club they come to, here. It's a sort of a Scout Club. They wears soldier clo's. An' they does things fer people. An' I want'er b'long—" he gulped, noisily.

The Young Doctor leaned against the wall. He did not realize how tall and strong he looked, leaning there, or he could not have smiled so whimsically. To him the small, dark boy with his earnest face, standing beside the gray kitten, was just a huge, rather lovable joke.

"Which do you want most," he questioned, "to wear soldier clothes, or to do things for people?"

Bennie gulped again, and shuffled his feet. His voice came, at last, rather thickly.

"I sorter want to do things fer people!" he said.

More than anything else the Young Doctor hated folk, even children, who say or do things for effect. And he knew, well, the lure that soldier clothes hold for the small boy.

"Say, youngster," he inquired in a not too gentle voice, "are you trying to bluff me? Or do you really mean what you're saying? And if you do—why?"

Bennie had never been a coward. By an effort he steadied his voice.

"I mean," he said, "what I'm a-tellin' yer. I want'er be a good boy. My pa, he drinks. He drinks like—" the word he used, in description, was not the sort of a word that should have issued from childish lips. "An' my big brother—he ain't like pa, but he's a bum, too! I don't want'er be like they are—not if I kin help it! I want'er be th' sort of a guy King Arthur was, an' them knights of his'n. I want'er be like that there St. George feller, as killed dragons. I want'er do real things," unconsciously he was quoting from the gospel of Rose-Marie, "wi' my life! I want'er be a good husban' an' father—"

ALL at once the Young Doctor was laughing. It was not an unkind laugh—it gave Bennie heart to listen to it—but it was exceedingly mirthful. Bennie could not know that the idea of himself, as a husband and father, was sending this tall man into such spasms of merriment; he could not know that it was rather incongruous to picture his small, grubby form in the shining armor of St. George or of King Arthur. But, being glad that the Young Doctor was not angry, he smiled too—his strange, twisted little smile.

The Young Doctor stopped laughing almost as quickly as he had started to laugh. With something of interest in his face he surveyed the little, ragged boy.

What Has Gone Before

ROSE-MARIE, who has come from her sheltered, quiet home in the country to the Settlement House in the city's slums, clashes at the dinner table with the Young Doctor, an orphan, who has had to fight for opportunity all his life. She is imbued with a passion to make people better, while he avows as his only purpose a desire to make them healthier without regard to their souls. In a tiny park Rose-Marie later interrupts a small boy in his torturing of a kitten, rescues the animal, and wins the friendship of the lad by discovering the one tender spot of his heart—love of his younger sister Lily. She visits the Volsky home, without telling her associates at the Settlement House, and finds it more dirty and squalid than she had dreamed any home could be—the father in a drunken stupor; the mother dull and hopeless; Ella, the elder daughter, beautiful but hard; Jim, the elder son, with a nameless menace in his eyes. Lily, the only means through which Rose-Marie can arouse the family to better things, is blind, and deaf, and can not speak. Rose-Marie's absences when she is calling on the Volsky family are noticed by the Young Doctor, who jestingly accuses her of having a beau. But the girl is able to arouse in Mrs. Volsky a desire for improvement.

"Where," he questioned after a moment, "did you learn all of that stuff about knights, and saints, and doing things with your life, and husbands and fathers? Who told you about it?"

Bennie hesitated a moment. Perhaps he was wondering who had given this stranger a right to pry into his inner shrine. Perhaps he was wondering if Rose-Marie would like an outsider to know just what she had told him. When he answered, his answer was evasive.

"A lady told me," he said, "A lady."

The Young Doctor was laughing again.

"And I suppose," he remarked, with an effort at solemnity, "that gentlemen don't pass ladies' names about between 'em—I suppose that you wouldn't tell me who this lady of yours may be. Even though I'd like to meet her."

Bennie's lips closed in a hard little line that quirked up at one end. He shook his head.

"I'd rather not," he said very slowly. "Say—where's th' Scout Club?"

The Young Doctor shook his head.

"It's such a strange, old-fashioned, young person!" he informed the empty hallway. And then, "Come with me, youngster," he said kindly, "and we'll find this very wonderful club where small boys learn about doing things for people—and, incidentally, wear soldier clothes!"

Bennie, following stealthily behind him, felt that he had found another friend—something like this lady, only different!

CHAPTER XI

ROSE-MARIE, was exceptionally weary that night. It had been a hard day. All three of her classes had met, and late in the afternoon she had made good her promise to wash Mrs. Volsky's hair. The task had not been a joyous one—she felt that she could never wash hair again—not even her own soft curls or the fine, snowy locks that crowned her aunts' stately heads.

Mrs. Volsky had once more relapsed into her shell of silence—she had seemed more apathetic, more dull than ever. But Rose-Marie had noticed that there were no unwashed dishes lying in the tub, that the corners of the room had had some of the grime of months swept out of them. When Ella Volsky came suddenly into the flat, with lips compressed, and a high color—Rose-Marie had been glowingly conscious of her start of surprise. And when she had said, haltingly, in reference to the hair—"I'll dry it for you, Miss Rose-Marie!" Rose-Marie could have wept with happiness. It was the first time that she had ever heard Ella offer to do anything for her mother.

Jim, coming in as she was about to leave, had added to Rose-Marie's weariness. He had been more insistent than usual, he had commented

A Question of Fair Play

IN THIS time of economic conflict, the public raises its voice against excessive industrial strife in which it suffers as a helpless victim. It is made to pay for a large part of the economic waste which many strikes involve, and it usually happens that the organization or association which causes a strike, inflicts direct and heavy losses upon many who have no share in the contention, but who get caught in the undertow. There is no law on the statute books to protect these involuntary sufferers, who, like the unfortunate "innocent bystander," get hurt in quarrels that don't concern them personally, simply because their business happens to be in the path of the disturbance.

In order to apply a remedy by affording more protection and fair play to those who now suffer unjustly in economic troubles, two bills have been outlined for submission to state legislatures. The first measure is designed to make unincorporated associations suable, and legally capable of being held responsible for the result of their acts. It is meant to be equally applicable to associations of employers or workers, and its operation would therefore be strictly impartial. Such associations, it is reasonably urged, should no longer be beyond the reach of civil process in any jurisdiction. Collective responsibility should travel hand in hand with collective action. With such a statute on the law books of a state, no association of workers or employers could claim to be a privileged institution, and beyond the reach of the law.

The second measure proposed by the League for Industrial Rights is designed for the better protection of public welfare against unwarranted strikes and lockouts. The need of such a law is almost too obvious for discussion. "Unwarranted industrial warfare"—the term employed in the bill, we are to understand as applying to a strike or lockout among employees whose terms of employment are fixed by the state or the United States. The measure is also protective against strikes in violation of agreements already made between employer and worker, or employer and labor union; it also provides against strikes in violation of arbitrational awards, strikes to enforce terms of employment which have never been presented to the employer or his representative for consideration; and strikes where there is no trade dispute in question involving material benefit to either party. This second bill, which is equally operative against both employers and workers, provides that those injured through such unwarranted strikes shall be entitled to recover through an action at civil law.

These two measures are strictly in line with what is needed for public protection. The bills are a step in the direction of establishing a public policy in regard to industrial differences, and an aid in the elimination of premature, unnecessary and unjust strikes or lockouts.

Beyond question, the strike habit is demoralizing. No one would benefit more by such laws as those that are now proposed than the workers themselves, including even the foreigners who, being ignorant on such matters, are constantly misled into distressing situations. But the American people, too, should have a voice, and their rights should be considered—a point which can only be attained when they are adequately defended or protected against unnecessary, unjust and wholly uncalled-for strikes. Our nation believes in fair play, and the spirit of our traditions as well as our Constitution recognizes the right of the individual to the full enjoyment of life, liberty and happiness, which involves freedom to labor. All infringements of such rights are to be regarded as un-American and unfair. This right has been violated times without number, until the repetition has become a menace to our political and economic safety. To reassert this right in the fullest sense is the object of the two proposed statutes. Their impartiality should commend them to public approval.

Suppose

SUPPOSE some morning this New Year you should take up your daily paper, and read these headlines in very large type?

CONGRESS TAKES EXTRAORDINARY ACTION ON DISARMAMENT! A VOTE OF TWO TO ONE ON GIVING NOTICE TO THE REST OF THE WORLD THAT, BEGINNING WITH THE YEAR 1921, THE UNITED STATES WILL CEASE TO BUILD ANY MORE BATTLESHIPS OR MAKE ANY MORE WAR MATERIAL! THE ARMY AND NAVY WILL BE REDUCED AS FAST AS PRACTICALLY POSSIBLE TO A SUFFICIENT POLICE FORCE TO MAINTAIN ALL NECESSARY PROTECTION TO LIFE AND PROPERTY IN THE UNITED STATES. THOSE NOW ENGAGED IN THE MILITARY SERVICE WILL BE PROVIDED FOR IN AGRICULTURAL, OR BUSINESS, OR EDUCATIONAL PURSUITS. NOTICE IS HEREBY SERVED TO ALL THE NATIONS OF THE WORLD THAT IT WILL BE THE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES TO DISARM, AND CEASE TO MAINTAIN A MILITARY EQUIPMENT WHICH IS AN UNNECESSARY TAX AND BURDEN ON THE PEOPLE. CONGRESS APPEALS TO ALL THE OTHER NATIONS TO DISARM. IF THE NATIONS WILL ACT TOGETHER, THE GREATEST PROSPERITY AND HAPPINESS WILL FOLLOW. WARS WILL CEASE AND MILLIONS NOW SPENT TO KEEP UP A MILITARY EQUIPMENT WILL BE USED TO DEVELOP THE AGRICULTURAL AND EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES OF THE COUNTRY. DISARMAMENT IS SENSIBLE, GOOD BUSINESS, AND ABOVE ALL, CHRISTIAN. WHY NOT? ALL TOGETHER!

Suppose you should read that sort of news in your daily some morning?

And suppose the policy of Congress should actually be carried out!

What would happen? We are not giving any opinion ourselves. We want to know what our readers think.

Would any nation on earth, in the face of such a statement by our Congress, immediately plan to come over here and try to conquer this country? Would Great Britain? Would France? Would Germany? Would Japan? Or any other world power? We are not giving our opinion. We want to know what you think.

Would a policy of that sort appeal to the common sense of thinking mankind? Would Great Britain do the same? Would other nations begin to disarm?

How is disarmament going to begin unless some one of the great world Powers makes a beginning? Why should not the United States make such a beginning?

Japan has lately said she could not begin to disarm unless the other Powers did the same. Would the common consent of mankind prevent any nation from attacking the United States if we actually disarmed?

Suppose we did—what then? What do you think?

Prehistoric Skyscrapers

EVERY little while the world receives some new impression of the force and truthfulness of the Scripture which tells us: "That which hath been is that which shall be, and there is no new thing under the sun. Is there any thing whereof it may be said, 'See, this is new?' It hath been already in the ages which were before us." Until now, we have been accustomed to regard the skyscraper as a modern device. When critics pointed us to the cliff-dwellers' habitations, the answer would be ready: "Yes, but they are merely burrows in the rocks." Yet the germ of the idea was certainly there.

At a recent meeting of the Archeological Institute of America, in Baltimore, a wonderfully interesting account was submitted of the discovery of a stone apartment building, forty-five stories high and with no less than a thousand rooms. It is conjectured to have been the home of a tribe of American Indians long since extinct. This prehistoric skyscraper, as excavations in the neighborhood have disclosed, is believed to have been the community center of a town or group of towns in what is now known as the Southwestern Desert. It is a crude embodiment of the idea of a vast domiciliary abode. Without a trace of the elegance or architectural symmetry of the ancient cliff dwellings of Petra, with their beautiful pillars and rich carvings, all done in the solid rock, there is nevertheless in it the parent idea which modern builders have placed at our disposal to make life in the altitudes tolerable. Truly, as the preacher says in Ecclesiastes, "That which hath been is that which shall be." Ages may be forgetful, but ideas live.

Disarmament Gaining Ground

SINCE we wrote a week ago on disarmament, the whole question has suddenly come to the front with a prominence that shows how deeply the leaders of thought throughout the world are impressed with its importance. They have come unanimously to the conclusion that world peace can not be assured unless there is, first of all, an agreement among the leading nations looking to a reduction of the gigantic expenditures which the continued policy of big armaments would involve. All are looking for some united action which would include, as a prime condition, a "naval holiday"—a period of stocktaking and revision, with a view to reaching a mutual arrangement for curbing expenditures. Whether this should ultimately come through the League of Nations or through other means is still an open question; but whichever government takes this initiative, it must be prepared with a proposition so liberal and definite that it will command the respect of other governments, and induce them to follow its leadership.

But the very announcement that the leading governments are even now seriously considering the question of reduction, is in itself reassuring. They realize that their people desire it, because it would lessen their heavy burdens, give new vitality to business and make life more tolerable for all. In our own land, public opinion is finding voice and expression, showing how rapidly the sentiment is growing in the same direction.

On the whole, therefore, we may look forward having the entire subject under review during the coming months. Now is the psychological time for open discussions. As Mr. Hoover has pointed out our enormous expenditures on battleships "at time when great masses of humanity are dying starvation in certain parts of the world, is an inconceivable folly!" Three Great Powers, the United States, Great Britain and Japan, are making heavier outlays on their navies than all the other nations added, should unite on a program for limitation of armaments, all the other governments would follow, combined. An international conference to discuss armament reduction has been suggested by Secretary Daniels. Let us hope that it will bear fruit in the near future.

Is It Right?

WE ARE living in a world of tremendous contrasts, and perhaps at no time in its history has it been necessary that every one who has a conscience exercise it to the fullest and most consecrated extent.

How about these questions?

When 45,000,000 human beings in China are face to face with actual starvation, when 3,500,000 children in Central Europe are going to die for lack of food some time before next spring unless people who have food send it to them, when the people of Vienna and Armenia and Palestine and other countries have not sufficient food to sustain life—

Is it right for us here in America to spend large sums in banquets, many of them, yes, most of them for the sole purpose of social pleasure?

When millions of people on the other side of the world are in need of the common elemental things that make life barely comfortable, when fuel is so scarce in some parts of the world that people are tearing down parts of their houses to keep from freezing—

Is it right for us here in the United States, even if we have the means, to spend large sums in buying luxuries? A magnificent store in one of our large cities advertises that when it is completed it will sell exclusively only the most expensive silk goods. It is not wrong under certain human conditions to buy the most expensive silk garments. But is it right to do it now when millions of human beings are dying for lack of common food? Is it right?

When the agony and misery of suffering humanity is on a scale never before known in the world's history, when one dollar will keep a child from dying, when the cry of agony that rises to heaven is a wail that ought to drown the dance music of the frivolous and the lascivious, is it right that a people calling itself at least nominally Christian spend a round billion dollars on amusements in a year, as the people of America did last year? Is it right? It is right for a people to have amusement and spend some money to get it. But is it right to do it now when the hearts of millions of fathers and mothers are breaking over the suffering of their children?

There are certain conditions in this world that ought to determine human conduct. What might be right at some times in history may be very wrong at other times. Ask yourself the question—Is this a time in the world's history for any man or woman to waste money, time, energy, in any thing? It would not hurt the people of America to go without banquets for a while. No one would die if the bill of expense for amusements were cut in two. The world can live without some things. But it cannot live without physical food. When millions have no food, is it right for me to spend money on things I do not need? Is It Right?

The World News of the Week

Demand for Disarmament Gains Strength at Home and Abroad

PUBLIC sentiment in favor of some measures which will end the international competition in armaments has been manifesting itself more and more strongly, particularly in the press of Great Britain and America. The greatest concern has been aroused over the race for naval armament among the United States, Britain and Japan, and appeals have been addressed to the public to exert pressure on the governments against the great naval programs which are being considered.

In Great Britain, the consensus was that relief must come through an agreement of these three Powers to stop all new construction and enter into a compact of retrenchment. The British editors were inclined to blame the United States for the new naval competition, but saw a useful sign in the agitation in America to have the program reduced. It was declared none of the Powers could afford to spend the sums on its navy, and it was predicted that any concerted steps toward limiting armies and fleets would find Britain practically unanimous in the desire to cooperate.

The agitation in America for disarmament brought from Secretary Daniels an explanation that the naval estimates submitted to Congress do not provide for the construction of a new group of capital ships but ask only for money to continue the construction of the vessels authorized by the 1916 program. He suggested the holding of a conference of nations solely on the question of armaments in case no such agreement is obtainable through the League of Nations or some similar association. Mr. Daniels stood firm in opposing an agreement for a naval holiday to include Great Britain, Japan and America, on the ground that such an agreement would be viewed with suspicion by other nations.

It was said in London that final decision regarding Britain's naval policy and the Anglo-Japanese alliance would be deferred until the conference of the premiers of the British dominions in May. This delay would permit Britain to take the policy of the new American administration into account in formulating its program and afford to Mr. Harding an opportunity to take the lead in a movement toward disarmament.

Harding Selecting His Cabinet

WITH Senator Harding turning the theme of his Marion conferences with Republican leaders from foreign to domestic topics, there was an intensification of interest in the probable composition of his cabinet, and announcement of his selections for the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury were expected almost any day.

The slate mentioned most frequently was as follows: Secretary of State, Charles E. Hughes, of New York; Secretary of the Treasury, Charles G. Dawes, of Illinois; Secretary of Agriculture, Henry Wallace, of Iowa; Attorney General, Harry M. Daugherty, of Ohio; Postmaster General, Will H. Hays, of Indiana. John W. Weeks was a favorite for Secretary of the Navy or Secretary of the Interior; while Herbert Hoover was discussed for Secretary of Labor or Secretary of Commerce. This slate represented only guesses, but the guesses were those of men in close touch with the President-elect and may be taken as indicative of the selections most in favor with Mr. Harding at this time.

Financial matters furnished one of the important subjects at the Marion conferences, and members of Congress who occupy committee positions which familiarize them with the problems of government finance and taxation took a prominent part in the week's discussions.

Congress Practicing Economy

A REDUCTION of $432,696,373 in the estimates of federal departments was made by the House Appropriations Committee on the sundry civil and post-office bills as the first step in the paring of $1,400,000,000 from the aggregate of $4,600,000,000 asked by all departments for the next fiscal year. The sundry civil appropriation was cut from $804,525,484 to $383,271,292, and the sum for the Postoffice department was reduced from $585,406,902 to $573,964,721.

The largest single reduction was that of $147,000,000 on the estimates of the Shipping Board, which must be supported entirely from various sources of income. One elimination regarding which there will be debate was the denial of the Department of Justice's request for $300,000 to enforce national prohibition, those for last year and the tax-payers must not begin to rejoice too early.

D'Annunzio Surrenders Fiume

GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO, after holding Fiume for many months in defiance of Italy and of the Allies, has surrendered his powers to the Fiume Communist Council and announced he would leave the city by airplane. The end of his régime came after the Italian Government decided that he must be ousted at all costs, and after a considerable portion of the city had been captured by the loyal Italian troops.

The government forces suffered heavy casualties in the fighting, as their commanders refused to permit the use of artillery, except against military buildings and endeavored to conduct their advance with the least possible loss of life. D'Annunzio's legionaries handicapped themselves in no such fashion and resisted desperately, mowing down their countrymen with machine-gun fire and laying ambushes wherever possible. Hand grenades were employed freely, as much of the fighting was in the streets, and perhaps the greatest losses to the attacking forces were due to these weapons.

When it became apparent that the city would be taken by storm, a truce was arranged and d'Annunzio's representatives accorded complete recognition of the Treaty of Rapallo between Italy and Yugoslavia, by which Fiume is to be an independent city. The poet-warrior himself still was irreconcilable and denounced the government's course, issuing a proclamation declaring it was not worth while dying for Italy. There were pro-d'Annunzio demonstrations in several cities in Italy, and the police found it necessary to intervene to restore order, but the government had the situation firmly in hand.

British Labor Discusses Ireland

A CAMPAIGN to bring the influence of organized labor in Great Britain to bear on the government in support of self-determination for Ireland has been launched and will be continued vigorously until February 15. A special conference of the Parliamentary Labor Party was held in London to hear the report of the Party's commission, which investigated conditions in Ireland, and a resolution was adopted unanimously challenging the government to disprove the commission's charges regarding reprisals and other outrages attributed to the Crown forces.

Another resolution endorsed proposals for peace negotiations between the government and representatives of the Irish people, and suggested a program which would involve the withdrawal of all armed forces from Ireland and the drafting of an Irish constitution, subject only to conditions for the protection of minorities and for the safeguarding of Great Britain against Ireland becoming a military or naval menace to her.

Premier Lloyd George's willingness to discuss peace with responsible Irish representatives has yielded no definite results as yet, but it was expected peace efforts would continue.

An Astronomical Discovery

ONE of the greatest triumphs of science in recent years was announced to the world when Professor Albert A. Michelson, of Chicago University, read at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the results of his experiments with a new device for measuring the diameters of stars by a process known as the "interference method." Applying his device to Alpha Orionis, one of the stars in the constellation of Orion (and which bears among observers the common name of "Betelgeuse") he found the most astounding results. Betelgeuse, he discovered, has a diameter a little more than three hundred times that of the sun, and nearly as large as the orbit of the planet Mars. His estimate gave to Betelgeuse a diameter of 260,000,000 miles. His conclusions concerning this wonderful star are stated in these words:

"If it were placed as near to us as the sun, its brilliant surface would fill out the whole visible heavens. Compared with the sun in volume, it is 27,000,000

A SCENE IN DOWNTOWN CORK AFTER ITS GREAT FIRE

This view of Patrick Street gives an idea of the havoc, caused by the incendiary fires, the loss in which was estimated at from $15,000,000 to $25,000,000. It forms a tragic chapter in present-day Irish history.

although $15,000 was allowed for prohibition enforcement in Alaska. For death or disability claims of World War veterans and related items arising from the war, $223,000,000 was provided, a reduction of $100,000,000 having been made.

Even these drastic reductions leave nearly a billion dollars to be eliminated from the other appropriation measures, but the House leaders were planning on taking the greater part of this sum out of the army and navy bills, while there are nine other supply measures on which economy may be practiced.

House members interested in items which have been reduced may be expected to put up a fight for certain increases, but the economy program determined upon by the leaders gives hope that the appropriations may be held down and a distinct start made toward lower governmental costs, without impairing the efficiency of the federal departments. The cuts already made, however, do not bring the totals below

"Ye Must Be Born Again"

A Sermon by Rev. CHARLES M. SHELDON

TEXT—Acts. 17:6. "These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also."

I GO to a man who is not a professed Christian, and I say, very frankly: "You know that you ought to be a Christian. You know that you are not making the best use of life as you are living it. You know there is a real difference between a sincere Christian and one who is not. You know that this difference is due to a difference of purpose in living, not to church membership, or any outward pledge or form. Now why don't you take Christ at His word? Believe Him when he says, 'Turn unto me and your soul shall live,' and from this time go in and out before this community a changed man, devoting yourself, your energies, your money-making, everything, to the cause of sinning humanity, and a loving Saviour? Why don't you do it?"

This man says to me: "What's the use of making so much fuss about all this? What's the use of getting excited? What do you want to turn the world upside down for? Why can't you preach a comfortable, easy, say something like a fifty-degrees-above-zero kind of morality, something that a man can go to sleep by without losing the connection? You make me uneasy. I can't do what you ask. Why, if I became a real true Christian, I should have to do a heap of things I don't want to do. And there isn't any need of it. I'm comfortable the way I am. Why can't you let me alone? If I am willing to risk it for this life and the next, whose business is it anyway?"

"Just let me give you a bit of advice. Go slow. Take it easy. Don't try to turn men upside down in their religious thinking and living. It doesn't pay. Besides, you'll be in hot water all the time. Men who are sailing along comfortably and satisfied the way I am, don't want to be turned upside down. The best thing for you to do is to go for the stiff-neckedness of the old Jews, or show up the awful depravity of the heathen. Then the community can enjoy itself, and get in a nap or two on Sundays. But when you begin to get too personal, you will get into trouble."

"Let the old world go along the way it's been going. You can't upset it anyway. Your lever isn't long enough. You'll only tire yourself out without accomplishing anything."

Well, perhaps that is so, but I don't know. It seems to me I would rather bend or break my lever trying to upset the old world than sit back indifferently and let it go the way it wants to. I am aware that isn't the way the majority feel. If a man's wagon wheel wants oiling so badly that it squeaks, I don't know that I'm called on to oil it for him. Let it squeak, especially if he seems to enjoy it. That is the attitude of the majority; and has been, from Paul's time to the present. "These that have turned the world upside down are troublesome fellows, bigots, fanatics, officious, meddlesome, visionary dreamers, who are not satisfied unless everybody is riding the same hobby they are riding. The world would be better off if these fellows could be shut up somewhere, and compelled to take turns in preaching to one another."

OUT of these words spoken so long ago by the same class of men who exist so largely today we may get two main thoughts, one discouraging, the other encouraging.

The first is this: The dislike of sin to be disturbed in its sinning.

And the second is this: The thorough treatment of sin demanded by Christianity.

This first thought we say is discouraging. "The dislike of the world to be turned upside down in its sinning." Doesn't it seem almost incredible that men have to be urged to accept the terms of salvation? You go to a man and say, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, accept Him as Saviour, and live according to His life and teachings and it will be eternal life for you. It will make more of a man of you all around. You won't be any poorer or less successful as a farmer, a business man, a citizen. Your belief, lived out in Christian character, will be a daily source of comfort to you. The town will honor and respect you for your Christian life. And when you die and appear before God at last, your sins having been forgiven, you will not be afraid or ashamed to meet Him, because you have known something of the joy and satisfaction of loving and serving Him here."

What does the man say to this? He says, practically, "You let me alone. I'm having a good time. I tend to my own business. I ain't bothering you any. What difference does it make to you how I live? Perhaps I'm going all wrong; but if I am, that needn't worry you any. Don't try to turn the world upside down. It's going fairly well, the way it is."

Suppose we make this thought plainer still. Monday morning the streets of this city are busy with the farmers who have come in to buy and sell; some of them have come in from a long distance. You go up to one of them as he sits in his wagon by the corner of some store, and say, very earnestly and soberly:

"I have a proposition to make to you. You have been living for ten years on one of the dullest, roughest old farms in the state. It is seventeen miles from everywhere, and all up-hill both ways. There is a mortgage on your farm too, almost heavy enough to make it a hole in the ground, and you know you can't pay it off inside of a hundred years, if you work twenty-four hours a day and let your wife take summer boarders. You have got a horse and wagon then, worth about fifteen dollars apiece, and one of them will die of old age and the other drop to pieces from the same complaint within a year anyway. As for yourself, you have grown old long before your time. One of these days you will lie down in your forlorn farmhouse out there, and the news will get about after awhile, 'Old man — is dying, they say; stroke of paralysis.' Then the next word will be, 'He's dead.'

I don't want to move. What difference does it make to you where I live? I don't more'n half believe you've got this farm, anyhow. Men don't give away farms for nothing. I'd rather stay where I am."

Christ comes to you and says: "It grieves me to see you wasting your strength and wearing out your life on the hard, rocky hill farm of sin and indifference. I love you and would do you good. Listen to me. I will pay off this heavy mortgage of sin and give you a rich new farm on both sides of the river of life, on condition that you take me at my word and love and trust me a little. Is that a hard condition? Is it any more than I have a right to expect? Could I, in justice to you or to myself, exact any other condition? Have I any unselfish motive in all this? Do I want to make you miserable by turning upside down your old way of doing things? Is not my only object in all this, a love for men, a desire to have them live as they ought to? Is there any reason why you should refuse my offer?"

And is it possible that you say to Christ: "Don't trouble me. I'm having a pretty good time where I am. What's the use of turning every thing upside down? To be sure, that old mortgage of sin bothers me sometimes. I shouldn't object if you could pay that off and rid me of the rebukes of conscience and the sting of remorse. But, can't you do that, without expecting me to move? Besides, I don't know that I believe in your rich new farm on both sides of the river of life."

And it is thus, O our Blessed Master, that men crucify Thee afresh! The nails are driven again through those feet that ever walked on errands of mercy to suffering humanity. Through the hands stretched out in compassion over the race are pressed again the blunt-pointed irons every blow made more acute by the scornful or indifferent rejection of the very souls for whom Thou didst first suffer. Over that royal but pale brow, the crown of thorns is deeper crushed by those who fiercely or selfishly deny Thy right to the supreme affection of their lives. And yet Thou didst die for them! How can it be possible that Thy love can be thus despised!

Are men such brutes as to shut their eyes and their minds to the grandest tragedy this earth ever saw? To harden their hearts to the most sublime love this world ever knew? To set their wills against the wisest, most thorough teaching for daily life that was ever given to an ignorant, blinded world!

But this is the mystery of sin, "that men love darkness, rather than light, because their deeds are evil." And this is the discouragement of sin, that it wishes to be let alone. That it is entrenched in its sinning. That it resents too much interference. To the man who rejects Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour, every live, earnest, aggressive Christian and preacher is one of these who turn the world upside down. He is making a great fuss for nothing. He is meddling with other people's business. Nevertheless, let those of us who believe in Christ, who have a firm faith in the great redemptive work which He came to do, who perceive in the soul of man immense and unmeasured responsibilities and eternal possibilities, let us not be frightened nor shamed out of our rightful desire to turn the world of sin upside down. We have a right to fight evil everywhere we find it. And by the Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, we mean not only to fight it, but to conquer it, by turning it upside down.

WE TURN for a brief glance at the second thought suggested by the text: The thorough treatment of sin demanded by Christianity.

We believe that goodness will in the end triumph over badness. The whole spirit and teaching of the Bible lead us to hold this sweet and encouraging hope. There is a continual pointing forward to a perfect happy time when sin and suffering shall be done away. And even here, surrounded by all the weaknesses and limitations of earth and flesh, Jesus Christ, with His uncompromising love, confronts men with this startling demand, "Ye must be born again." No half-way measures. No half beliefs. No sneaking into the Kingdom of Heaven under false pretenses. A surrender of self, change of heart, a new principle, a new purpose, a new man is what Jesus demands, and by making the demand, He shows it is possible for men to obey. Christ doesn't demand impossibilities. When He says to a man, "I want you to change, so that people can see it. I want you to be what you never have yet been, a real true son of God. I want you to repent, that is, to turn right around and walk and live the other way; I want you to be born again"—when He says

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"How Firm a Foundation," or "Jesus, the Very Thought of Thee."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 37. Read first 11 verses.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 57, first column.)

Sermon—"YE MUST BE BORN AGAIN"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Nearer, My God, to Thee," or "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

O Thou who seest our daily need, as Thou hast broken to us the Bread of life, seated at the head of our table, kindly grant to us the refreshing grace of Thy smile of friendship as we go our ways to take up again our day's work. May it all be filled with strength and courage as we part from one another. In the Master's Name, AMEN.

He was a good neighbor, but he had a mighty hard farm to work."

"Now I'll tell you what I'll do. I've got a farm down here on the river only a mile from the city. It's one of the best farms in the world. I want you to quit your old farm and come and live on mine. I will pay off your mortgage, and help move everything of value down to my farm, and give it to you on just one condition; that you live on it, and take good care of it. You understand, I will pay off the old mortgage and give you this farm of mine if you will come and live on it. What do you say to that? Think of the benefit you will gain for yourself and family. You can make a living, and more, too. Your wife will have the pleasure of better society. Your children can have better school privileges, and you will be able to make more of yourself in every way. I will go with you to the lawyer's office and transfer the title deed to you plainly and fairly. I have no object in doing this except to help you. It grieves me to see how old, and wretched, and poor you look. The truth is, I love you, and would do you good. There are several men in this town now who are living on farms which I gave them for the old farms. There is one of them over there by that store now. He owns the handsome farm you drove by this morning as you came into the city. What do you say?"

WHAT do you suppose this old farmer says to this proposition of yours. In the first place, instead of listening eagerly to your offer, he seems anxious to get away. But you are so earnest with him that he can't do that very well. Then he listens sullenly, and critically, and when you get through, he says: "I guess my farm is as good as yours any day.

The Leisureliness of God

SUNDAY. II Pet. 3:8. "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." We are not thinking on a sufficiently adequate scale: our thoughts cannot wrap themselves about the entirety of the place. We know what ministry an enlarged scale accomplishes even for some of the smaller things which lie in the term of human years. A thing looked at in the scale of one day is quite a different matter when set in the scale of seventy years. The scale of one day obscures purpose and tendency, and veils "the far-off interest of tears."

I lately read some extracts from a printed diary, and I would like to give you a part of them. The first is from the diary of a boy, and I will give it just as it appears:

"I cannot pretend to like this school, however much I try. The head is a beast, and not one of the under masters is a decent chap. I hate being kept in after hours when the other fellows are going out to games; yet, whenever I haven't done a lesson right, they make me do it until I know it thoroughly. This is constantly the case with my Latin. Also I do loathe the food they give us; we have to eat fat and lean together, and fat is beastly. Also, however cold it is, we have to take long runs, when it would be much nicer to sit by the fire and be comfortable. Also, I can't understand my father and mother, who say they love me and all that, sending me to such a place."

Just fifty years later the same hand wrote these words, when the writer's name was known throughout the world:

"Of my many advantages in early life, I place easily first my parents, whose particular method of training me was beyond all praise. . . . In looking back upon my first school, I can think of it only with affection, for the manner in which the masters treated my inert tendency of character was entirely admirable. To their insistence at that period, I owe one of the keenest delights of my maturer years, a love for the Latin authors. . . . In the matter of physical soundness, also, I am certainly much indebted to the school runs, which were compulsory, and to the wholesome and sensible diet on which we were fed, without which I should not possess today the virility which has kept me free from disease to a quite unusual extent."

Need I point the moral of the contrasts? The boy's entry enshrines a verdict fashioned upon the scale of a day; the man's entry declares a judgment fashioned to the scale of fifty years.

It is all a matter of scale! "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." In things of the day He has in view the thousand years; the thousand years being the full-maturing of the designs that moulded the little day. "Where is the promise of His presence?" Think upon the scale of a thousand years. J. H. J.

The "Lord of the Harvest"

MONDAY. Luke 10:2. "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth laborers into his harvest." Also John 4:35. These scripture passages are filled with key-notes which strike harmonies of Divine Truth in the heart of the Christian believer.

We are told, in the first place, to lift up our eyes and look—for vision is always essential if great things are ever to be accomplished. A little study of the word "lift" would soon show you that Christ and the disciples were always lifting up something, for we read about how they lifted up their eyes, their hands, and also how they lifted up others.

In these verses we are being urged to lift up our eyes in order that we may catch the vision and see the full.

Again we are told to pray. We are to pray before we go to work. Prayer is the thing that releases the sources of God and makes things possible for men. We are also told to pray to the Lord of the Harvest, and it is well for us to notice that He is the One Who is not dependent upon the Harvest, but upon Whom the Harvest depends. He is not inferior to the Harvest, but superior to it. We are not to be anxious about praying for the Harvest, because the Lord of the Harvest will take care of the results.

The thing we are to pray for is that He may send forth laborers, that the Harvest may not fail, because there are not sufficient workers to gather it in. The country has just been through a period during which it was impossible to save our crops and our fruit, because of the lack of workers. This same thing may cause the failure of the great Spiritual Harvest, which otherwise would be possible for the Church of Christ and the Kingdom of God.

Now comes the promise of wages, and here they are spoken of as fruit unto life eternal—nothing temporal about this. God is a good paymaster and rewards the laborers with the coin of Heaven and Life everlasting. W. W. B.

Spirit-Torn

TUESDAY. Mark 9:20. "And when he saw Jesus, straightway the spirit tare him." This is the story of the invalid boy whose case at the foot of the Mount of Transfiguration had baffled the disciples. When the boy saw Jesus he suffered a fresh seizure, a convulsion. Brought into the presence of the Great Physician, the disease from which the child had suffered seemed accentuated. In his case the darkest hour had come just before the dawn. As Dr. Matheson of Edinburgh suggests in one of his books, the story of the spirit-torn child illustrates the pain which is sometimes occasioned by the presence of Jesus. Do we not recall the story of the star that troubled Herod? The star of Bethlehem, which brought comfort to so many, brought trouble to the king. The reading of the Holy Scriptures brings distress of mind to some. It is like carrying a torch into a cavern. How the bats do flutter! To use another figure, the reading of the Scriptures is sometimes like the probing of a wound, or like the flashing of a bright light into a diseased eye.

When the Gospel comes to a pagan land, it generally means the stirring of a spirit of unrest, but it is the pain of enlightenment. "Hark, what soundeth? 'Tis creation groaning for a better day."

The effect of the vision of God upon the youthful Isaiah was primarily to plunge him into the deepest distress of self-analysis and self-abhorrence. What effect has the thought of Christ upon our minds? When we confront Him, are we not rebuked for our selfishness and our sin? Christ makes demands upon us. There is infinite appeal in His Gospel. We are torn by so much as we cling to that which is less than the best. What is our reaction to the sight of the Cross? Calvary makes demands upon us. Was not this fact behind Paul's matchless ministry? Is it not the secret of the missionary motive? Whatever stirs us up, lacerates our spirits, disturbs our rest, sets us to agonizing, gives us fellowship with the Christ who was never satisfied until He had fulfilled the Father's will. C. C. A.

The Touch of Life

WEDNESDAY. Luke 8:45. "And Jesus said, 'Who touched me?'" Matt. 8:15. "And He touched her hand and the fever left her." We are living in feverish times. The bewildering throng, the nerve-racking sounds, the hurly-burly and rush and roar of the world are never far removed. We go from the contest of nations to the political scramble, and from new ways of making money to new ways of having a "good time." Business is always on the verge of a crisis, society is always springing a new sensation, capital always nearing a panic and labor always getting ready for a strike. What is the cause of the upheaval and the unrest and when will things settle down?

Never; till the world invites the intimate touch of Christ. He was thronged and He was mobbed in the olden days, but few really touched Him. Those who really touched Him knew that they had experienced the touch of life. The woman with the issue of blood, the mother of Peter's wife—they touched Him and were instantly healed in body and soul. The disciples touched Him and after that people knew that they had been with Jesus.

We would go on hands and knees, over a long rough path, to touch Jesus today. But that is denied us. And if it is denied us it must be because there is a better way of touching Him. And that is to touch His heart and to touch it directly with our own.

Everywhere about us we feel the touch of death. Without the divine touch we perish. They say these are reconstruction days and we must expect an unsettled condition in society and the world generally. I say the world does not need to be reconstructed, which is the same as being reformed. It needs to be regenerated and saved from its sin by the touch of Life. H. P. H.

He Giveth Power

THURSDAY. Isa. 40:31. "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." The power problem is one of the most serious economic problems of the world. Our coal supply is limited. Scientists are now studying how to avail themselves of water power, sun power, atomic energy. More important still is the problem of spiritual power. One of Matthew Arnold's poems gives us the picture of a needy world. He represents the age as hovering between two worlds, "one dead, the other powerless to be born." Only a little while ago we saw a sudden accession of moral power—heroism, chivalry, generosity, sympathy, a glad abandon to a great cause. The World War called out the best that was in men and the worst. Since the war ended, there has been a decline of moral power. The world has grown again commercial, selfish, narrow. Men are thinking in terms of profit and loss. How soon after Pentecost the Church experienced just such a decline! Ananias and Sapphira belonged to the Pentecostal age! Humanity is a poor, weak thing. A man took a clock to a repair shop. It was a new clock, but it had run just an hour and stopped. The clock maker found all it needed was winding. We need an access of power. Such is the Biblical view of humanity: "Dost thou not know? Hast thou not heard? . . . He giveth power."

This is important if true. And it is true. The power is available and the channel by which that power is communicated is at hand. "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." We wait upon the Lord when we pray, when we meditate upon His word, when we submit our plans to Him for correction, when we lean upon His promises for comfort, when we stay our minds on Him for serenity, when we look to Him for help along life's way, and for special help in life's emergencies. C. C. A.

"Called Out and Led In"

FRIDAY. Gen. 12:1—"The Lord said to Abram, 'Get thee out of thy country, unto a land that I will show thee.'" Regardless of the critic, we are going to assume that Abram actually lived, and that he was called out of his homeland to be led by God into the promised land. His story thus is really the story of every God-led man. He is called out of the world where he has made his home in sin, and finally led into the promised land.

Man had failed in the garden; he had failed after the Flood; he had failed under the prophets and the law—for man without God has always been a failure. God now determines to give man another chance and Abram is selected as the beginning of a new nation.

In making this start, God had to call him out to something. For every man who is going to walk with God must hear a call which takes him out of his old life into a new one. Not only is Abram called out, but he is led in. It is essential for us to realize that God always leads us into more than he calls us out from; that what we are to find will always be greater than what we have ever left; that our gain will always be more than our loss.

God has a place into which he wants to lead us. Like Abram, let us obey, even though we may not know whither we go; for there is a special joy in being led by God alone. W. W. B.

The Soul's Sure Anchorage

SATURDAY. Heb. 6:19. "An anchor both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil." The further your faith can see beyond the horizons of your home, your office, your country and the little world you are living in, the nearer will be your approach to God. When Augustine carried the Gospel to Britain he was invited by the Druid king to preach before him. A swallow flew into the tent and, circling round, flew out again. "So," said the king, "is our insignificant life; a brief and futile thing. We come and go; if thou canst tell us whence we came or whither we go, speak on." And the Druid king was right, so far, that if time and space be all, life is not worth while.

But faith sees further than the circumscription of our finger-tips. It sinks its anchor into the deep—down, down, fathoms beyond the scrutinizing gaze of science or philosophy. It grips something within the veil—something that holds, something that makes it impossible for an immortal soul to drift. What is that something? The Rock of Ages! "I am like a shipwrecked sailor," said the most eloquent of modern unbelievers, "like a sailor on a raft in mid-ocean, without chart or compass, drifting I know not where." Thank God for a faith that can see within the veil and say, "I know whom I have believed and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day."

Here is the secret of assurance, of the only assurance any mortal man can have, to wit, the assurance of faith. If one can lay his hand on the anchor-chain and feel it tremble—not slip nor slide, but tremble—as if an electric current were passing through it, he may know that the Boatswain of his soul has cast anchor for him within the veil. It is thus that the Spirit witnesseth with our spirits that we are children of God; and if children then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away. The Bowery Mission's New Work

Reclaiming the Victims of the Drug Evil

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MOST people know little of the unfortunate ones who are victims of the drug habit. Drug victims are seldom spoken of in polite society; they are regarded, somehow, as far beyond the pale. Drunkards are worked with, are helped, are, if possible, reformed. They receive a ready sympathy and a ready council. There are recognized homes, institutions and cures for them. But your drug addict is brushed aside, is neglected and, often, forgotten. Folk somehow feel that he has gone too far to be helped, that nothing short of a miracle can bring him back to new hope and sanity. And folk, now-a-days, are not prone to believe in miracles!

It seems almost unbelievable that there should be any large number of drug addicts in a civilized community. It seems hardly possible that one's own town or city should have its quota of sufferers. But it is possible; it has been proved that there are a great many cases in our midst. A recent survey of New York City showed that there were 20,000 cases in five boroughs!

IHAD heard that the Bowery Mission was in some way helping the drug victims of the city. I had heard it from many sources but nobody had told me just what the Bowery Mission was doing, just how it was helping. But because, for a good many years, I have seen the Bowery Mission give help to the broken in soul and body, I knew that its new work—whatever that work might be—would be worth while!

And so I went down to the Mission, one afternoon, to see for myself what was happening. I went with a great deal of curiosity, and with a great deal of confidence, too. I went to learn, at first hand, of this new work with the derelicts of the city.

As I went in through the door of the Mission, I passed two boys that were standing in the doorway. They were both very young—neither one of them could have been more than eighteen years old—and yet they looked strangely old, as old as sorrow and dread and hopelessness. As I glanced at them, almost casually, I felt a thrill of something that might have been apprehension. I felt as if I were looking past them into some human tragedy that I could scarcely understand.

The boys did not notice me. Even though I was very close to them as I passed—even though my elbow must have touched one of them as I went by—they did not notice me. Indeed, they seemed very far away, in some remote world of their own that was far removed from the sunlight and fresh air of my world. Their dull and curiously hopeless eyes were fixed upon space, or upon something that I could not see.

I hurried past them. I was suddenly anxious to get away from the nameless horror that seemed to surround them. But, as I went quickly up the Mission stairs I found details of their appearance coming back to me with a horrible persistence. The curious twitchings of their unboyish mouths were photographed upon my brain, the way that their hands had of clenching and unclenching was quite too horrible to forget.

IT was to Mr. Baker's office that I went. Mr. Baker is the Assistant Superintendent of the Bowery Mission and is the connecting link between the doctors who treat the drug addicts and the Mission itself. He, I told myself, would know more than anyone else about this new work. And so I went to his office.

The office is a small one, crowded to overflowing with the bits of detail that fill an Assistant Superintendent's time. Its one window looks out upon the elevated railroad that runs down the Bowery; its one door opens into the room that has always been used as an employment bureau. As I passed hurriedly through this outer room I had a confused sense of something very different, for the room is usually filled with men who are roughly clad, men of the laboring class. I caught a subdued rustle of skirts, I saw strained women-faces. I glimpsed rich furs among the poorer garments, and here and there I caught the gleam of satin and of silk. I went through the one door that opens into Mr. Baker's office with a sense of very real bewilderment.

Mr. Baker was sitting at his desk. He smiled at me as I came through the door—the kind smile that many a broken life has met and responded to.

"And what can I do for you?" he questioned. I came hurriedly—and breathlessly—to the point. "I want to know," I told him, "what you all are doing, here at the Mission; I've heard that you're having a clinic now. And that you're treating people who are victims of the drug habit. I want to hear all about it—how you started the work, and why, and how it's being carried on. Will you tell me?"

Mr. Baker waved me to a chair, and settled back into his own place. His face was suddenly alight with interest—I could see that the new work held a real thrill for him. When he began to talk I knew that the splendid idea had completely taken possession of him.

"Drug addiction," he told me, "is what might be called a social contagious vice. We have always known that to be true of alcohol. . . . When I use the term I mean that the drug habit is communicated from one person to another and that there are certain parts of the city in which a person is tempted to start using drugs. There are criminals—criminal is too mild a word to use!—who make their living by preying upon the weaknesses of their fellow men."

"There was a certain woman, a Dr. Mulhall, who had, for a very long time, endeavored to help the ones afflicted by the drug habit. She wanted, in some way, to lessen their burden. But she found every avenue of approach for the hospitalization of the drug addict closed. She organized bureaus of relief and information again and again in an effort to deal with what had become a menacing situation. But to the city authorities, to the owners of buildings, drug addicts were like pariah dogs. They were not wanted. A bureau would only stay open a week or two, and then Dr. Mulhall and her associates would be served with a dispossess notice. After a short time full of very bitter experiences the doctor was forced to admit, to herself, that she was facing defeat. Drug addicts could receive treatment only in jails or on Blackwells Island—surrounded by criminals of every sort. And yet the work was state work—work that the law was supposed to enforce and uphold!

IT was then that the Bowery Mission, hearing of the doctor's difficulty, came forward with a ready offer of help. And the doctor, ousted by city authorities and by civic and philanthropic organizations, found a place to carry on her work in the room—"Mr. Baker's hand gestured toward the place that had been the employment bureau—"in the room that you just passed through!"

He paused and, after a moment, I asked a question. "You gave them a room to use," I prompted "and then—?"

"And then," Mr. Baker told me—"we meant to let the doctor and her helpers follow their own course of work. But somehow," he laughed depreciatingly, "we couldn't keep our fingers out of the pie! We found that we had to do something. And the something took the form of spiritual aid."

"The last three days of every month the registered drug addicts—the law compels that every drug addict be registered—are supposed to report to the bureau for examination and a chart which will enable them to get their quota of drug for the balance of the month. At each visit to the doctor this amount is lessened, until a minimum is reached. And then, if the addict is willing, he (or she) is sent away to a hospital to take a cure."

"I sat here in my office, watching the men and women, and girls and boys, come in for their charts. I saw them take their examinations. And, as I watched them, I could not help wishing that I might be able to do something for them. They so needed help."

"There was nothing, of course, that I could do to help them physically. The bureau was taking care of that end of it. But, as I sat in my office, the thought grew upon me that here was a great field for spiritual work. For surely these poor unfortunates needed the courage and help that religion—and only religion—can give!"

ISPOKE, first, to the doctors about my plan. I did not want to do anything against their wishes. I told them simply that I wanted to give a glimpse of Christ, and of Christ's salvation, to their patients. I was very much surprised when Dr. Carlton Simon, who has accepted a position as deputy police commissioner in order to assist in the fight against the drug evil, answered me:

"We will be very glad," he said cordially, "of any help that you can give to our patients!"

"With that encouragement I went to work. I mingled with the patients. I invited them to come into my office and talk with me. I didn't urge them to come—neither did I command them. I only invited them. But some of them did come."

"There was a young French girl. She had married a drug addict and he had given her the habit. She had been an easy victim, had gone from one drug to another. And now—young, beautiful, and with all of life before her—she had realized the end of the road."

"She came to my office, and I talked with her. And, as I talked, I watched her face. I couldn't help thinking, as I watched her, that she was something of a thoroughbred—the marks of refinement about her were still very evident, despite her trouble. When I had finished talking she proved that I was a judge of character. With the tears streaming down her face she spoke to me."

"I, too," she told me, "have been a Christian. Only—I have gone far away. See—I will give you this!" And she laid her chart in my hand and walked rapidly from the room. That was six weeks ago and she has not come back. And she cannot procure drugs without the chart. Somewhere, I know, she is making a very gallant fight!

"There are many others that I have reached. There was a boy who had acquired the habit in a hospital. He is taking a cure, now. There was a father who is now trying to win out for the sake of his wife and children. Yes . . . there are many others!"

Mr. Baker paused again and I grasped the opportunity to speak.

"I wonder if it will be all right for me to walk through the room where they are," I questioned, "without letting them know that I'm looking at them?"

Mr. Baker rose from his place at the desk. "I'll take you," he said, "we'll act as if we're going to see one of the club rooms on the other side of the building."

WE went out through the one door that led into the room that had been used as an employment bureau. And as we walked across the room I glanced at the faces of the ones who were waiting for their chance to see the doctors. They were sitting on long benches, and all the misery in the world was sitting beside them.

The pity of it was that most of them were younger than I am! There were not many old faces—they were all at the age when they should have been starting out valiantly on life's journey. There were white-lipped girls, and haggard boys, there were young men and women.

I walked in front of them. And as I walked in front of them I saw that some were watching me and that others were not aware of me at all. The ones who watched me were wondering, I could tell, whether I was one of them. Some of them seemed vaguely to resent my presence, and I could not exactly blame them. And others looked through me with a ghostly, phantom-haunted gaze. I was glad when the walk across the room had ended, glad to be away from those vague, tormented eyes. As we gained the inner room Mr. Baker spoke.

"Perhaps you can understand now," he said gently, "why we wanted to help."

It was a moment before I could answer. And then—

"Yes, I can understand!" I told him.

And as I went away from the Bowery Mission I knew that its newest work might develop into its greatest work!

upon her rosy cheeks and he had made a laughing reference to her wide eyes. And he had asked her, gruffly, why she didn't take up with some feller like himself—"a good provider, an' all, that'd doll her up the way she'd oughter be dolled up?" And when Ella had interrupted, her dark eyes flashing, he had told her—with a burst of soul-chilling profanity—to mind her own business.

And then pa had come in, more drunk than usual. And Rose-Marie had seen his bleary eyes pass, without a flicker of interest, over his wife's clean apron and freshly washed hair; had seen him throw his coat and his empty bottle into one of the newly dusted corners, had seen his collapse into a heap in the center of the room. And, last of all, as she had hurried away, with Jim's final insinuation ringing in her ears, she had known the fear that all was not well with Bennie—for Bennie came in, every afternoon, before she left. She could not know that Bennie, by this time a budding Boy Scout, was learning more lessons of the sort that she had taught him.

YES, she was weary, in every fiber of her being, as she sat down to supper that night. She had it quite alone in the dining-room which, all at once, seemed very large, for the Superintendent was sitting, somewhere, with a dying woman, and the Young Doctor had been called out on an emergency case. And then, still alone, she wandered into the library of the Settlement House and picked up a book. She felt, somehow, too tired to sleep, too utterly exhausted to lay her head upon her pillow. It was in the library that the Superintendent, coming wearily back from the watch with death, found her.

"My dear," said the Superintendent, and there was a sound of tears in her usually steady voice, "My dear, I'm about all in! Yes, I know it's slang, but I can't help it—I feel slangy! Come up to my sitting-room for a few minutes and we'll have a cup of hot chocolate!"

Rose-Marie laid down her book with alacrity. She realized, suddenly, that she wanted companionship of her own sort, that she longed with all of her soul to chat with some one who did not murder the queen's English, that she wanted to exchange commonplaces about books, and music, and beautiful things—things that the Volskys would not understand.

"I guess," she said, as she followed the Superintendent into the cozy sitting-room, "I guess that tiredness is in the air today. I'm 'all in,' myself. A cup of chocolate and a friendly talk will be a godsend to me, this evening!"

The Superintendent was laying aside her coat and her hat. She smoothed her hair with a nervous hand, and straightened her linen collar, before she sank into an easy chair.

"Child," she said abruptly, "you shouldn't be tired—not ever! You've got youth, and all of the world at your feet. You've got beauty, and confidence, and faith. And I—well, I'm getting to be an old woman! I feel sometimes as if I've been sitting on the windowsill, watching life go by, for centuries. You mustn't—" She paused, and there was a sudden change in her voice, "You're not tiring yourself, Rose-Marie? You're not doing more than your strength will permit? If you could have read the letter that your aunts sent to me, when you first came to the Settlement House! I tell you, child, I've felt my responsibility keenly! I'd no more think of letting you brush up against the sort of facts that I'm facing, than I would—"

SHE was interrupted by a rap upon the door. It was a gentle rap, but it was, above all, a masculine one. There was real gladness on her face as she rose to answer it.

"I didn't expect Billy Blanchard—he thought he had an all-night case," she told Rose-Marie, "How nice!"

But Rose-Marie was rising to her feet.

"I don't think that I'll stay," she said hurriedly, "I'm too tired, after all! I think——"

The Superintendent had paused in her progress to the door. Her voice was surprisingly firm, of a sudden; firmer than Rose-Marie had ever heard it.

"No, my dear," said the Superintendent, "you're not too tired! You just don't want to be civil to a very fine boy—who has had a harder day than either of us. You came to the slums, Rose-Marie, to help people—to show that you were a Christian. I think that you can show it, tonight, by forgetting a silly quarrel that happened weeks ago—by forgetting the words Dr. Blanchard said that he never really meant, inside. If he thought that these people weren't worth it, do you suppose he'd stay here, at the Settlement House, for a mere pittance? He's had many a chance to go to fashionable hospitals, uptown!"

Rose-Marie, bewildered, and not a little ashamed, sank back into her seat as the Superintendent swung open the door.

The Young Doctor came in with a springing step, but there were gray lines that spoke of extreme fatigue about his mouth, and his eyes were darkly circled. His surprise, at the sight of Rose-Marie, was evident—though he tried to hide it by the breeziness of his manner.

"You'll be glad to know," he told the Superintendent, "that the stork has called on the Stefan family. It's a boy—nine pounds—with lots of dark hair. There have been three girls, in the Stefan family," he explained to Rose-Marie, "and so they are wild with joy at this latest addition. Papa Stefan is strutting about like a proud turkey, with his chest out. And Mamma Stefan is trying to sing a lullaby. I feel something like a tool in the hand of Providence, tonight!" He threw himself down, bravely, upon the sofa.

THERE was deep, motherly affection in the Superintendent's face as she smiled at him.

"We're all of us mental and physical wrecks this evening, Billy!" she said, "I think that I've never been so utterly worn out before. Katie" (Katie was the stolid maid) "is making chocolate for us!"

"Chocolate!" The Young Doctor's glance answered the affection that shone out of the Superintendent's face—"You are a dear!" He smiled at her, and then—all at once—turned swiftly to Rose-Marie.

"Don't let's squabble, tonight," he said childishly, "not about anything! We're dog tired, all three of us, and we're not up to even a tiny quarrel. I'm willing to admit anything you want me to—even that I'm wrong on a lot of subjects. And I want you to admit, yourself, that you'd rather be here, with the two of us, than out in some den of iniquity—reforming people. Am I right?"

Rose-Marie felt a glow of friendship toward the Young Doctor. Why couldn't he always be like this—confiding and boyish and approachable? She smiled at him, very sweetly, as she answered.

"You're right," she admitted. "I'm afraid that I haven't the heart to think of reforming anyone, this evening! I'm just glad—glad from the very soul of me—to be here with you all, in the very center of this—'island!'"

The Superintendent's face was puzzled—the Superintendent's eyes were vague—as she asked a question.

"You said—'island?'" she questioned.

Rose-Marie laughed with a shade of embarrassment.

"I didn't really mean to say island," she explained, "but—well, you remember what Dr. Blanchard told us, once, about the little bugs that fastened together—first one and then another until there were billions? And how, at last, they made an island?"

She paused and, at their nods of assent, went on. "Ever since then," she told them slowly, "I've thought of us, here at the Settlement House, as the first little bugs—the ones that the others must hold to. And I've felt, though many of them don't realize it, though we hardly realize it ourselves, that we're building an island together—an island of faith!"

THERE was silence for a moment. And then the Young Doctor spoke. His voice was a trifle husky.

"You've made me more than a bit ashamed of myself, Miss Rose-Marie," he said, "and I want to thank you for putting a real symbolism into my chance words. After all—" suddenly he laughed, and then—"After all," he said, "I wouldn't be surprised if you are right! I had a curious experience, this afternoon, that would go to prove your theory."

The Superintendent was leaning back, shielding her eyes from the light. "Tell us about your experience, Billy," she said.

The chocolate had come, and the Young Doctor took an appreciative sip before he answered.

"Just as I was going out, this afternoon," he said, at last, "I ran into a dirty little boy, in the hall. He was fondling a kitten—that thin gray one that you brought to the Settlement House, Miss Rose-Marie. I asked him what he was doing and he told me that he was hunting for a Scout Club that he'd heard about. I—" the Young Doctor chuckled, "I engaged him in conversation. And he told me that his ambition was to be a combination of St. George and King Arthur and all the rest of those fellows. He said that, some day, he wanted to be a good husband and father. When I asked him where he got his large ambitions he told me that a lady had given them to him."

Rose-Marie was leaning forward. "Did he tell you the lady's name?" she breathed.

The Young Doctor shook his head. "Not a thing did he tell me!" said the Young Doctor dramatically. "The lady's name seemed to be something in the nature of a sacred trust to him. But his big dark eyes were full of the spirit that she'd given him. And his funny little crooked mouth was—" He paused, suddenly, his gaze fixed upon Rose-Marie. "What's the matter," he queried, "What's the matter? You look as if somebody's just left you a million dollars!"

Rose-Marie's face was flushed and radiant. Her eyes were deep wells of joy.

"I have every reason in the world," she said softly, "to be happy!" And she was too absorbed in her own thoughts to realize that a sudden cloud had crept across the brightness of the Young Doctor's face.

Proud to Speak English

IN ORDER to make English instead of Finnish the predominating language in certain rural communities of Minnesota, in order to take the place of the night schools which would be impractical in these isolated districts and in order to bring Americanization right into the homes, St. Louis county has adopted an original and laudable method of Americanization in its rural schools. It has won the praise and appreciation of school superintendents in other states, of parents and teachers, and of city and state officials.

It is the Speak-English campaign being conducted by the little children in the county rural schools. Prior to the launching of this campaign three-fourths of the people in the rural districts of the county talked Finnish always; they spoke to their children in Finnish continually, they did their purchasing at Finnish stores or places employing Finnish help and even on the school grounds Finnish was the one language.

But now these conditions are no more. There are over 2,800 little Speak-English workers in these rural schools, and after the dishes are cleared away at night the Little Teachers get their primers out and begin teaching their parents their daily lessons.

THOSE enrolling in the campaign sign the following pledge: "We, the undersigned, believe that to be true Americans we must speak the language of America. We therefore pledge ourselves to speak the English language at home and at school as far as possible and to encourage and teach others to do the same."

Then their enrollments are mailed to Miss Stella Smith, of the county superintendent's office, who sends a large poster with the names of the pledges on little red, white and blue shields. Those enrolling are also sent buttons upon which is printed, "We Speak English."

The success of the campaign has been almost phenomenal. The children are constantly encouraged by the county superintendent's office and are now working to have their parents become American citizens.

Every day brings to Miss Smith thumb-marked letters from the little enthusiasts. A few of these letters will show you the real spirit of these little Finnish girls and boys in the farmhouses of Minnesota and how they are working for 100 per cent. Americanism.

A little fourteen-year-old writes: "I am teaching my mother as much English as I possibly can. She always takes the newspaper and I tell her the meaning and pronunciation of the hard words. She could not read at all last year and now she can read quite well. I am going to teach her how to do better, for all those who can speak English in my school have pledged themselves to make the Speak-English campaign a success."

A letter from a ten-year-old says: "I am a member of the Speak-English campaign and have been trying to do my part in teaching my father to read and speak English. My father read three books during the last month."

"One day I was in my father's store and a man asked in Finnish if I'd give him some candy. I said, 'Speak English and I'll give you some.' The man blushed but said nothing. One day I was talking with a girl about seventeen years old. She was talking to someone else in Finnish. I showed her my Speak-English button and said, 'I speak English.' The girl blushed and said, 'English is right. I'm going to speak it from now on.'"

ANOTHER spirited little worker writes: "I have tried to do my best in teaching English and I think I have succeeded. I have taught two men to read and when I talk to the men in the American language they answer me correctly. These two men are working for us so I taught them because I couldn't teach my parents as they always speak English. They were eager to learn and I told them that if they learned to read English they would make better citizens and Uncle Sam would be proud of them."

One of the rural teachers writes: "When visiting the many homes in my district recently I found out things that you'll be pleased to hear about. The mothers spoke English to me! And they told me how glad they were to think that their children have come to realize their short-comings and to be so interested in them. The youngsters help their parents continually by speaking English and teaching them."

"The children, or Little Teachers, were not always able to define the words, so the mothers asked me. I have distributed the posters. My pupils sent a pledge to your office some time ago in which they pledged to speak and teach English. As my older pupils were signing it, a beginner walked up to me with damp eyes and asked: 'Teacher, may I write?' I read to my father in the evening. This was little Ilmar Pust, aged five. The same spirit was shown throughout the class. They are all enthusiastic about this Speak-English campaign."

Promotion in the Kingdom

By LUTHER DENNY WHITEMORE, Litt. D.

THE passage assigned for study in this lesson marks a distinct transition in Matthew's narrative. Up to this point the interest of the reader has been centered in the work and words of Jesus in their relation to the events which He and His disciples saw and in which they were conspicuous participants; but now a keen anticipation is excited, and if it were possible for us to forget for the moment all that we know about the sequel, we should share with the disciples' feelings of uncertainty and apprehension, and possibly of selfish expectation, believing, as perhaps they believed, that if the emergency predicted should appear, Jesus would be delivered from His enemies rather than delivered unto them.

How much material for thought the writer has condensed within these few lines! The words themselves seem scarcely sufficient to give a synopsis of the actual occurrence, but so fully are they chosen that they produce a vivid mental picture with wonderful detail: the Master forewarning His disciples concerning the suffering which He was soon to bear; the discordant note of Salome's ambition for the promotion of her sons; Jesus' gentle rebuke of this unseasonable request; the jealous indignation of the ten disciples whose hopes would be frustrated if James and John should have the highest places; and finally the marvelous declaration of the principles on which preferment in the Kingdom of Heaven depends.

How clearly Matthew shows what at that critical moment filled the minds of the individuals composing this group by whose decisions all future history was to be determined! and how oblivious were all of them, except Jesus alone, of the fact that they then occupied a pivotal point in human history! For the third time Jesus endeavored to impress upon the reluctant minds of His companions the thought of His impending death and resurrection. Quick to catch at favorable suggestions, James and John, vaguely conscious that some great change was imminent, were occupied with practical plans for personal advantage in the readjustment of their world, while feelings far from brotherly darkened the understanding of their fellow-disciples who had not yet learned to practice the Golden Rule.

REALIZING, as we must, the immeasurable distance between the visionary hopes of the disciples and the stern certainty which Jesus faced, we can only wonder at the Divine patience and the gentleness with which He used the situation to reaffirm in even stronger terms the conditions of membership and promotion in His kingdom, in which all worldly standards were to be reversed. Here Jesus went beyond the Golden Rule; for doing to others as we would have others do to us implies a relationship of equality and a generous rivalry in well-doing; whereas, assuming the place of a minister or servant implies a humility in which self-interest is absolutely lacking.

Nowhere else, and by no other person, has the fundamentally social character of the Gospel message been more clearly stated. What philosopher or teacher, before the time of Christ or since, has based a system of the philosophy of conduct upon the doctrine that salvation belongs not to him who seeks it for himself, but to him who seeks it for another? Or who else revealed the precious truth that heaven is not a far-off place where in a time far distant, rewards will be apportioned to those whose good deeds are sufficiently meritorious; but that the Kingdom of Heaven is present in the heart of every one who loves the heavenly Father and who, in obedience to His will, gives his life in loving service. The religion which Jesus taught and practiced is not manifested in an isolated life of self-satisfied contemplation, but in a life of action; for faith without works is dead, and the works which are acceptable are the deeds of love and kindness such as were the works of Jesus when He went about doing good.

The situation in the world today may be compared with that in which the disciples found themselves when they were accompanying Jesus on that eventful last journey to Jerusalem. Not for three short years, but for more than nineteen hundred years the teachings of Jesus have been known and in a measure understood; but even now there are some, perhaps many, called disciples, who think that the social gospel is an ideal which is unattainable in practical affairs. The world is not yet ready, they say, for the introduction of a program so radical as that of Christianity. But how can the way be prepared for Christianity except through the imitation of Christ? Jesus did not advocate an impossible ideal, but one which He Himself had tried. His doctrine that greatness is not attained by the exercise of authority but by self-giving was not based on theory but on experience. Observation verifies the fact that self-sacrifice is not merely a lofty sentiment but a law of nature, a law which can not be disregarded by an individual or by a nation without disaster.

As a direct consequence of the violation of this law, one of the greatest crises of the world's history has been precipitated. At such a time it behooves all Christians to renew their allegiance to Christ and to express their loyalty by action in accordance with their creed.

THE earthly Jesus did not appeal at first to the rulers of the governments of His time to adopt His politics on a grand scale; but He chose individuals from humble life to exemplify in their personal relations the principles of Christianity, and this has always been His method, placing responsibility upon ordinary men and women. "In a democracy," says Dr. Kent, "no citizen, however humble, is exempt from this responsibility. As has been truly said, 'Democracy is the political expression of the Golden Rule.' As interpreted by Jesus, it means not only the rule of the people, by the people, for the people, but also that each citizen is working as earnestly for the interests of his fellow-citizens as he is for his own, and that he is in turn the object of their constant consideration and care. Jesus set forth in clearest terms the basal democratic principle that the only valid ground for public honor and preferment is individual service in behalf of society.

The real aristocrats are those who give their best and all, whether it be much or little, to the commonwealth."

As the self-sacrifice of Jesus moved His disciples to devotion to His ideals in their own time, so the self-giving of those who in our time have imitated Jesus, should be a powerful incentive and inspiration to give practical effectiveness to the principles of Christianity in present-day affairs. That this may be done it is needful, as one has said, not only to study the Bible to find out what Jesus and the apostles did, but to study our own times and the conditions which prevail now, so as to discover where and how we may each individually make our offering of intelligent service. In this way we may show our loyalty to Christ Himself and help to make the Kingdom of Heaven a reality on earth today. To teach this lesson is perhaps the chief obligation of the Sunday school.

a. What are some of the hindrances to the practical application of the Gospel teachings to present-day affairs?

b. How may an organization composed of individuals, such as a family, a church, a college, a community, or a nation become Christian?

c. Is self-sacrifice in the Christian sense contrary to, or in accordance with, personal satisfaction?

How I Improved My Memory In One Evening

The Amazing Experience of Victor Jones

"Of course I place you! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle."

"If I remember correctly—and I do remember correctly—Mr. Burroughs, the lumberman, introduced me to you at the luncheon of the Seattle Rotary Club three years ago in May. This is a pleasure indeed! I haven't laid eyes on you since that day. How is the grain business? And how did that amalgamation work out?"

The assurance of this speaker—in the crowded corridor of the Hotel McAlpin—compelled me to turn and look at him, though I must say it is not my usual habit to "listen in" even in a hotel lobby.

"He is David M. Roth, the most famous memory expert in the United States," said my friend Kennedy, answering my question before I could get it out. "He will show you a lot more wonderful things than that, before the evening is over."

And he did.

As we went into the banquet room the toastmaster was introducing a long line of the guests to Mr. Roth. I got in line and when it came my turn, Mr. Roth asked, "What are your initials, Mr. Jones, and your business connection and telephone number?" Why he asked this, I learned later, when he picked out from the crowd the 60 men he had met two hours before and called each by name without a mistake. What is more, he named each man's business and telephone number for good measure.

I won't tell you all the other amazing things this man did except to tell how he called back, without a minute's hesitation, long lists of numbers, bank clearings, prices, lot numbers, parcel post rates and anything else the guests gave him in rapid order.

When I met Mr. Roth—which you may be sure I did the first chance I got—he rather bowled me over by saying, in his quiet, modest way:

"There is nothing miraculous about my remembering anything I want to remember, whether it be names, faces, figures, facts, or something I have read in a magazine."

"You can do this just as easily as I do. Anyone with an average mind can learn quickly to do exactly the same things which seem so miraculous when I do them."

"My own memory," continued Mr. Roth, "was originally very faulty. Yes, it was—a really poor memory. On meeting a man I would lose his name in thirty seconds, while now there are probably 10,000 men and women in the United States, many of whom I have met but once, whose names I can call instantly on meeting them."

"That is all right for you, Mr. Roth," I interrupted, "you have given years to it. But how about me?"

"Mr. Jones," he replied, "I can teach you the secret of a good memory in one evening. This is not a guess, because I have done it with thousands of pupils. In the first of seven simple lessons which I have prepared for home study, I show you the basic principle of my whole system and you will find it—not hard work as you might fear—but just like playing a fascinating game. I will prove it to you."

He didn't have to prove it. His course did; I got it the very next day from his publishers, the Independent Corporation.

When I tackled the first lesson, I suppose I was the most surprised man in forty-eight states to find that I had learned in about one hour how to remember a list of one hundred words so that I could call them off forward and back without a single mistake.

That first lesson stuck. And so did the other six. Read this letter from Terence J. McManus, of the firm of Olcott, Bonyne, McManus & Ernst, Attorneys and Counsellors at Law, 170 Broadway, and one of the most famous trial lawyers in New York:

"May I take occasion to state that I regard your service in giving this system to the world as a public benefaction. The wonderful simplicity of the method, and the ease with which its principles may be acquired, especially appeal to me. I may add that I already had occasion to test the effectiveness of the first two lessons in the preparation for trial of an important action in which I am about to engage."

Mr. McManus didn't put it a bit too strong. The Roth Course is priceless! I can absolutely count on my memory now. I can tell the name of most any man I have met before—and I am getting better all the time. I can remember any figures I wish to remember. Telephone numbers come to mind instantly, once I have filed them by Mr. Roth's easy method. Street addresses are just as easy.

The old fear of forgetting (you know what that is) has vanished. I used to be "scared stiff" on my feet—because I wasn't sure. I couldn't remember what I wanted to say.

Now I am sure of myself, and confident, and "easy as an old shoe" when I get on my feet at the club, or at a banquet, or in a business meeting, or in any social gathering.

Perhaps the most enjoyable part of it all is that I have become a good conversationalist—I used to be as silent as a sphinx when I got into a crowd of people who knew things.

Now I can call up like a flash of lightning most any fact I want right at the instant I need it most. I used to think a "hair trigger" memory belonged only to the prodigy and genius. Now I see that every man of us has that kind of a memory if he only knows how to make it work right.

I tell you it is a wonderful thing, after being around in the dark for so many years, able to switch the big searchlight on your ear and see instantly everything you want the member.

This Roth Course will do wonders in your office.

Since we took it up you never hear any of our office say "I guess" or "I think it about so much" or "I forget that right now" or "I can't remember" or "I must look up the name." Now they are right there with an answer—like a shot.

Have you ever heard of "Multigraph" Smith? Real name H. Q. Smith, of the John E. Price Co., Seattle, Wash. Here is just a bit from a letter of his that I saw last week:

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell: Mr. Roth has a most remarkable Memory Course. It is simple, and easy as falling off a log. Yet with one hour a day of practice, anyone—I don't care who he is—can improve his Memory 100% in a week and 1,000% in six months."

My advice to you is don't wait another minute. Send to Independent Corporation for Mr. Roth's amazing course and see what a wonderful memory you have got. Your dividends in increased power will be enormous.

VICTOR JONES.

While Mr. Jones has chosen the story form for this account of his experience and that of others with the Roth Memory Course, he has used only facts that are known personally to the President of the Independent Corporation, who hereby verifies the accuracy of Mr. Jones' story in all its particulars.

MARIE LYNDALL DARRACH

Adventures of the Food Family—Gelatin

MOTHER and JANE had made a little excursion to the Lighthouse storeroom to assemble a few members of the food family for the Gilson's Sunday dinner and Jane called attention to the packages of gelatine.

"I'm certainly grateful for this little food friend," mother said, as she selected a small paper box from the top shelf. "Each one of these packages makes enough jelly for all five of us. I know of nothing more satisfactory or inexpensive for dessert in the winter, especially when it is combined with a few simple ingredients, that often change its appearance completely."

At the dinner-table next day, the gelatine was the topic of conversation.

"There was a day long ago," remarked Mother, "when the gelatine of commerce was not a very superior thing. But that old-time sulphured, analine-dyed, artificially flavored gelatine would not dare show its face among the present day gelatines, in which natural flavors have taken the place of artificial products, and harmless vegetable colors are used instead of the old analine dyes."

"The Government demands that gelatine shall contain at least eighty-four per cent. of protein and not more than two per cent. of mineral substances," Father added, "but most of the food value of the prepared gelatine is due to the sugar. In its make-up it is about four-fifths sugar and one-fifth protein."

"There are several brands of the gelatine family now traveling about," resumed Mother, "and each has some special feature to recommend it. One kind is plain and unmixed with any flavoring or sugar and is over four-fifths protein. It dissolves in two seconds and is made into a jelly of perfect consistency with a quart of boiling water in two hours' time. This brand is most desirable as a foundation for fish loaves and jellied soups."

"Gelatine may end its adventures at the beginning or end of a meal then," laughed Father, "but to my way of thinking it is ideal as a dessert, as it is light and not too sweet, delicate and not too nutritious, thus making a fitting close to a heavy meal."

"That is true," agreed Mother, "and especially is it good for children. It melts and runs down their throats, it is chilled without being frozen, and has a sweet taste without an undue amount of sugar. It is easy to make and that certainly is an added advantage. There are only a few simple rules to follow. Everyone knows that a rubbery gelatine is a gelatine gone wrong. It should quiver or it is not what it should be. In using fruit, nuts, meat or fish with it, the liquid should be allowed to set slightly before adding them. Putting a thin layer of the fruit or meats on the bottom, then pouring some of the gelatine over it and putting it on the ice to congeal and then a little later, repeating this process and continuing till the mold is full gives the most satisfactory results, though it is a little more trouble. It is a good plan to rub the mold with oil or rinse it with cold water before filling with the mixture. In this way there will be no danger of the jelly losing its shape when turned out."

COFFEE JELLY

FOUR cupfuls of strong black coffee to which has been added one teaspoonful of vanilla and a pinch of salt are needed. Into this mixture is poured the instant gelatine, and a most satisfactory dessert to be served with whipped cream is the result. From this foundation a caramel jelly can be made or one to which chopped dates is added.

FRENCH FRUIT PUDDING

Chop one cupful of beef suet to a powder, adding a tablespoonful of flour as you chop it. Add one cupful of sour milk and half a cupful of dark molasses. Then stir in two cupfuls of flour, sifted with one and a half teaspoonfuls of baking soda, one teaspoonful each of ground cinnamon and cloves and half a teaspoonful of salt. Beat well and add one cupful of chopped seeded raisins, three-quarters of a cupful of currants, and a quarter of a cupful of chopped nut meats, sprinkled with half a cupful of flour. Mix the ingredients thoroughly, pour into a well-greased mold and steam four hours. Serve with foamy sauce.

CHOCOLATE AND NUT PUDDING

Mix three tablespoonfuls of chocolate or cocoa with three tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, half a cupful of sugar and a pinch of salt. Moisten with half a cupful of milk and cook in a double boiler for ten minutes. Stir in the beaten yolks of two eggs, stirring constantly. Let it cook for another minute. Add one teaspoonful of vanilla extract and half a cupful of chopped walnut meats. Cool slightly and divide into individual molds and chill. When ready to serve top each portion with a little whipped cream.

A WINTER SALAD

This attractive salad consists of green peppers parboiled or the canned red ones, stuffed with cream cheese and chilled. Chopped parsley and nuts may be mixed with the cheese for flavor. When very cold they may be sliced and placed on lettuce leaves. If the green and red peppers are used together it makes a very good-looking salad as well as a delicious tasting one.

PRUNE AND APPLE TART

Fill a deep baking dish with a layer of sliced apples, of sugar and of well-washed prunes. Cover with pastry and brush over with milk. Bake in a moderately hot oven for three-quarters of an hour or until the juice boils out of the pie. Sprinkle over with sugar and serve with cream.

CORNMEAL HOT CAKES

One quart boiling milk, two cupfuls of white Indian meal, one scant cupful of flour, one tablespoonful of butter, one tablespoonful of molasses, one teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in a little milk, one teaspoonful of salt, and two eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately. Scald the meal over night with the hot milk. Put this with the butter and sugar. Cover and let it stand until morning. Add the yolks of the eggs, the salt and flour. If the butter is too thick thin with cold milk before stirring in soda. The whites of the eggs should be added last and whipped in lightly. Fry on hot griddle.

CREAMED CALF'S LIVER

Use butter substitute for frying one pound of liver cut in thin slices, and seasoned with pepper and salt. Cook eighteen minutes until it is nicely browned. Remove from the pan and place on a hot platter and to the gravy add one sliced onion and let it cook one minute. Stir in one tablespoonful of flour until it begins to froth. Then draw the pan back and gradually add one pint of milk and cook a minute or two, stirring all the time. Replace the liver in the pan with the gravy and stew very slowly for five minutes longer.

CHICKEN CREOLE

Clean and cut up a young chicken, sprinkle with salt and pepper and fry. With a small piece of butter fry one slice of onion and add a tablespoonful of flour, browning slightly. To this add two red peppers cut fine, one cupful of tomatoes; one-half of a chopped green pepper and a teaspoonful of lemon-juice. Stir and boil until the sauce is smooth. Add the chicken and simmer for fifteen minutes.

Making a Hand-Bag

WHERE a hand bag is to be lined, the strongest and best finish for the top edge is secured by sewing the outer fabric and the lining together on the wrong side, on the sewing-machine, the first thing. Other seams—the last side seam for example—can be sewed by hand inside, if necessary. But the top receives the hardest wear and must, therefore be the most durable. The casing must also be reinforced as there is much wear in the pulling in and out of the strings and as large a casing as possible even for narrow strings, should be used to avoid this friction.

An extra strip should be sewed on the casing when the bag is made, as it will only have to be added later when the first signs of wear at that place begin to appear.

Rings sewed on the outside of the bag furnish a practical way to avoid this trouble with casing that wears through so quickly.

Beading a Blouse

TO bead a blouse or gown easily, trace a design with a soft lead pencil on tissue paper. Then baste the tissue paper with the pattern on the portion of the garment to be ornamented and bead right over the tissue paper on the lead pencil tracings. When it is completely beaded the tissue paper and bastings are removed in an instant.

This method makes it possible to bead any design that strikes one's fancy, as a pattern may be traced from a newspaper or magazine that would suggest itself only to a person who wished something original instead of the ordinary designs sold with fashion papers.

The Gilsons' Mail-Bag

DEAR Lady of the Lighthouse: I make a fruit pudding using gelatine which you may perhaps like to know about. I soak one package of gelatine in three-quarters of a cupful of cold water for five minutes. Then put a pint of milk in a double boiler, and add one and a half squares of chocolate which have been melted; or five tablespoonful of cocoa stirred to a paste with a little water may be used instead. When the scalding point has been reached add one cupful of sugar, a pinch of salt and the soaked gelatine. Remove from the fire and when the mixture begins to thicken add one-half teaspoonful of vanilla, one cupful of seeded raisins, one-half cupful of dates and one-fourth cupful of sliced citron or nuts.

Turn into a mold and chill and serve with whipped cream, sweetened, and flavored with vanilla. E. L. B.

Greenbrae, Oregon.

S. O. S. Flashes to Housewives

COFFEE will be better if one or two cupfuls are poured off and back again just before serving.

When packing pictures place a bit of cork at each corner of the frames between each two.

To prevent splashing when frying meat, sprinkle a little fat in the pan before putting in the meat.

When making starch, pour the cold starch into the hot water and a great deal of time will be saved. Also if it is stirred with a paraffine candle it will be unusually clear.

When wall-paper becomes soiled, put a tablespoonful of vinegar in a quart of lukewarm water, and wring a rag out very dry and go over the soiled places.

A cloth dampened with kerosene removes dirt from the rubber rolls of the clothes-wringer like magic.

To remove ink from the carpet, pour a little turpentine into a saucer, and into it shave some white soap. Stir until the liquid is applied; before the ink dries the spots will disappear immediately. It would be well to keep a small supply of it in a bottle always on hand.

If white material has become mildewed to such a degree that soaking in sour milk has no effect, a thick paste of table salt and butter may be put on the spots and the cloth laid in the hot sun, until they disappear.

In washing any delicate material with gasoline, if salt is added there will be no stain left at the edges of the washed parts.

Broiled green peppers make a delicious finishing touch to a steak or to braized beef.

Flat silver may be cleaned in the water in which potatoes have been boiled.

Push small brass-headed tacks into the lower corners of picture-frames. It will prevent the picture from marking the wall and also permit of a circulation of air behind it.

Buy cautiously at the bargain counter. The half or a third yard extra on the remnant is worth little to you unless you have use for it.

"Just Look What's Coming!"

If you ask the children, "What do you think is nicest for dessert?" you will get the answer: "Ice cream and Jell-O," or "Jell-O and ice cream."

It doesn't matter that the two are not at all alike. Either satisfies the craving for something that "touches the spot."

Ask the mother upon whom devolves the work of preparing the dessert which of the two she would choose for the children, and she will say: "I prefer Jell-O for the children, for they like it as well as ice cream, and it is better for them as a general thing."

In homes of wealth and culture, where the children's diet is carefully selected, and in homes where mothers with equal care prepare the food for the whole family, the favorite dish for the young folks is

JELL-O

There seems to be nothing else that so completely fills every requirement of a perfect dessert for children and grown-ups alike as Jell-O does.

It can be made into a surprisingly great variety of forms for dinners, luncheons and afternoon teas. The most bewitching things which Jell-O "demonstrators" show in their exhibits at food shows and the department stores can be made in perfection by any housewife—even by the young bride who cannot cook.

Just now Jell-O salads are especially popular. Dainty individual salads and entrees are moulded in teacups, small moulds or anything available for the purpose. To the housewife who has wished a hundred times that her salads might be made to look good as well as taste good, the Jell-O way is a revelation.

The new Jell-O Book, just out, describes new things in Jell-O: Beauty salads and plain ones—whips, knickknacks and dainties of almost unlimited variety. Recipes for every-day salads and desserts are given first place in it, of course, and particularly the new things in fruity Jell-O desserts. It is the finest of Jell-O books. A copy will be sent to you free if you will send us your name and address.

Jell-O is put up in six flavors: Raspberry, Strawberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Chocolate. To be had at any grocer's or any general store, 2 packages for 25 cents.

The flavors are pure fruit flavors, of course, and the full strength of the flavors is preserved by the air-tight waxed-paper "Safety Bags" enclosing Jell-O inside the carton.

Preferred Stocks—Their Advantages

By LUTHER D. FERNALD

Treasurer of the Christian Herald

PERHAPS the simplest distinction of preferred stocks is that they are preferred over common stocks, both as to priority of dividend payments, and as to any distribution of assets. Preferred stock holders are preferred partners, with superior rights, in the business.

Their rights are secondary to those of the bond-holders, if any, because the bond-holders are creditors of the company—entitled to the repayment of the money they have lent, with annual interest in the interim—and no more. Preferred stock is a continuous investment, except where the company is permitted to re-purchase it. Of course, when the company has no bonds outstanding, the preferred stock enjoys the conspicuously strong position.

The modern preferred stock has a very valuable feature not found in the older forms. Nowadays, the dividends are cumulative—if for any reason, the quarterly or semi-annual dividends are deferred, they must be made up before any payments can be made on the common stock. In other words, when a company had a year of poor profits, preferred stock dividends might be passed, but in a following year of large profits, the preferred would receive only the fixed annual dividends, while the common stock could receive larger dividends.

Under the modern plan, there is every incentive for the holders of the common stock to see that preferred dividends are paid regularly and in full, as otherwise there is no chance of common stock dividends being paid. Usually, no dividends are paid out on common stock until enough surplus earnings have accumulated to provide at least one year's dividends on the preferred stock, thus assuring preferred dividends even in a period of depression.

While secondary in rank to bonds, preferred stock enjoys one distinct advantage over bonds for the small investor—the dividends are exempt from the normal federal income tax, while bonds are only partially exempted, and in some cases not at all. Since the company pays a federal tax on its profits, the dividends (representing a distribution of these profits) are exempted from the normal income taxes of 4 per cent., and 8 per cent. This amounts to complete exemption from income tax for the person of moderate income.

The income tax blanks required for ordinary bonds are not required in connection with dividends; the company's dividend check, mailed to the investor, is simply cashed like any other check.

A feature of interest to small investors is the convenience of investing $100 or multiples of $100 at any time, as stock can be bought and sold one or more shares at a time. Instead of waiting to accumulate larger amounts, one share of stock can be purchased whenever $100 is available, and interest received from the day of investment. As the company makes a single dividend payment to each name, one dividend check would cover fifty single-share purchases. At any time, however, all the separate shares can be consolidated into one certificate, if desired.

At the present time, the average yield of sound preferred stocks is about 7 per cent. Good preferred stocks which are not subject to retirement represent an excellent opportunity for the investor to secure a permanent yield of 7 per cent., regardless of the drop in general interest rates to their former much lower annual yield.

Free Booklets for Investors

A number of interesting and valuable investment booklets have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these booklets free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address on the margin, or write us asking for the booklets by number. Address correspondence to 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc., Ask for Booklet No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Booklet No. 2 describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Booklets 4, 5 and 6 for city real estate bonds, and Booklets 7, 8 and 9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Booklet 11.

To invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Booklet 13.

Liberty Bonds—Booklet No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Long-term railroad bonds of the New York Central, Pennsylvania and other leading railroads, yielding from 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. at present prices, are featured in Booklet 21.

United States Rubber Co., 1st mtg., 5 per cent. bonds, due 1947, in denominations of $100, $500, and $1,000, yielding 6½ per cent. present prices, are featured in Booklet 36.

H. J. Heinz Co. 7 per cent. gold notes, in denominations of $1,000, $500 and $100, at a price to yield 7½ per cent. for ten years, are described in Booklet 33. The net earnings available for interest charges for the past four years have averaged five times the annual interest charge on these notes.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested, write for details.

that, He means that such a thing can be done.

And isn't that the encouraging part of the whole life of Christian principle? There is a power, a love, a breath of heaven, a blessed influence, call it what you will, it is nothing less than God's own might working in a soul, which can so change that soul's purposes and activities that what was once a stream of foul evil becomes a fountain of pure goodness; what once cursed Christ, blesses Him; what once scoffed at faith, now prays in all humility; what once denied God's Fatherhood, now claims with happy tears the right to be called His son. The world of sin in this man's soul has not been doctored a little or mended in broken places; it has been most completely overhauled and turned upside down in the process of regeneration.

Local treatment won't reach the seat of soul disease. Men have tried it and always failed. Sin is a chronic complaint, not a sympathetic affection.

Christ didn't die for the moral dyspepsia of humanity; He died for the heart disease of the world.

The thought I would leave with you is the encouraging thought that the evil of your life can be cured. Christ demands a good deal of me, you may say. True, and you ought to be glad of it. You don't want to be in any half-cured condition. You want to be made whole. You ought to be thankful that there is something in the world that can turn men upside down and make them thoroughly uncomfortable in their sins. This makes Christianity, not a sentimental philanthropy, but a rugged, honest, sturdy, divine enemy of sin for humanity's sake. Christ's face is turned full at men, all love and compassion even in man's sinful rejection of the better uses of life. All the more, then, is His demand that men turn to Him and live the demand which requires nothing less than the entire soul transformed—thoroughly from evil to good, through Divine grace that it is born again.

Young People's Topics for January 23

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

What Is Real Religion?

E. L. James I: 19-27. John 17: 3

JAMES in the first reference says: "Be ye doers of the word and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." John, in our second reference, says, "And this is life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou has sent." True religion, then, is to know Jesus Christ and do the will of God as revealed so perfectly in and through Jesus Christ.

True religion is prayer followed by practice. It is not debating, but doing. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." Our creed may be interesting but our deed is always convincing. True religion is not what a man says but what he does. The proper function of teaching and preaching is not to tell people how things ought to be done, but to show people how things are done. It is not so much instruction, as it is revelation.

Those who hear and obey are few in number in comparison with those who see and imitate. "The tree is known by its fruit." Individuals and institutions are judged by what they accomplish rather than the promises they make concerning their ability to do. True religion is related to the things of everyday life. The Son of God sends us, even as the Father sent Him, on errands of mercy, help and service meeting the needs of humanity in every sphere of thought and endeavor.

C. E. Isa. 52: 7-15

CHRISTIANITY and the missionary ideal are closely related. You can no more separate the Gospel and the missionary program than you can take the wetness from water, the sweetness from sugar or the sound from noise. The Church was not always alert to its opportunity and obligation to those in the foreign field. But the Church is now "catching up" with its Divine purpose. It is surely going into "all the world." It is studying bigger maps. It is making up for lost time. It is "redeeming the time" wasted. To say that Asia is responding to the Gospel of the Grace of God is a commonplace statement.

Read your denominational literature and you will be in possession of the most significant and thrilling current event of the day. The nations are ready for our Christ and the Christian thought and endeavor we have to offer. The response is one of the miracles of the twentieth century. Heathenism is doomed. Idols are being destroyed and fetish temples demolished. The universal prayer is still: "Sirs, we would see Jesus." Jesus Christ is the only Hope and Light for Asia. Everything else has failed. The Christ and his Gospel never fails. It never has; it never will. Read up on Asia, and bring your findings to the meeting, each member one item of how the missionary cause has conquered. Thus you will have an evening worth-while, spiritually and mentally.

Accomplishments and Possibilities

B. Y. P. U. Phil. 3: 7-14

NOT that I have already attained." You will find this phrase in the twelfth verse of the Scripture reference. There are new worlds to conquer. There are higher peaks to reach. There are wider horizons of achievements. Make this meeting a forum for the exchange of ideas, ways and means, plans and programs for the better progress and more efficient endeavors of the local society. Put the Union on a business basis. Hence the council of department heads and membership. All big business and captains of industry have a "get together" period from time to time. Why not a religious society?

We need more religion in our business. True. We also need more business in our religion. "Let everything be done decently and in order." This is good business sense and it is Scripture truth. Bring your ideas and ideals and talk them out in meeting. Give your initiative and organizing ability and talent for leadership an opportunity.

An individual or an organization without a program is not good logic. Your society may need money for carrying out its plans, but without ideas for the raising of funds, no plans will ever mature. Ideas must precede everything else. You may exchange with me dollar bills. Then you have a dollar and I have a dollar. We are no better off. You have an idea and I have an idea. We swap. Then you have two ideas and I have two ideas. "Wanted—men and women with ideas."

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer, or an acknowledgment of answered prayer thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

PRAYER Circles throughout the country are unitedly pleading that the New Year may witness a great revival and an ingathering of souls.

Dr. James M. Gray, Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, has issued a call for a Christian Workers' gathering, to be held during "Founder's Week" at the Institute, February 1 to 5 inclusive. He announces it as a conference, not so much for teaching and preaching, as "for prayer for the filling of the Spirit, and for revival among the people of God everywhere." The prayer leader will be Mr. Thomas E. Stephens, of the Great Commission Prayer League. Among the speakers expected are: Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas; Mr. Chas. G. Trumbull, recently returned from China; Dr. R. A. Torrey, Dean of the Bible Institute of Los Angeles; Rev. A. C. Dixon; Rev. Dr. Scarborough, president of the Southwestern Baptist Seminary, Fort Worth, Tex.; Rev. A. C. Latham, of Chester, Pa.; Rev. Dr. Woolston, of Philadelphia; and others.

"One Who Has Faith in Prayer," writes from Libertyville, Ill.: "Some time ago I wrote to you and requested that you remember my mother in a prayer, that her health might be restored. I wish to say that she is improving in health and will be well again. It is just another example of our Father's love for us."

Mrs. J. M. P., Broadway, N. C., also asks prayers for a revival in her church and "that the Lord will send us a pastor who will rightly fit our needs."

Mrs. C. G. B. writes: "I wish to send together with my offering, a request for prayer for this community (Curtis, Wash.) which is without an organized church; a small and poorly attended Sunday school is all the religious gathering they have. Not a man attends the Sunday school, except the Superintendent. Although this is a quite thickly settled place, no interest is shown for Christianity."

Mrs. N. T. H., in acknowledging answered prayers, writes: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for my dear little granddaughter, who was losing her eyesight and which was restored to her by direct answer to prayers by the members of the Prayer League. I can never be thankful enough to my Heavenly Father for his goodness and mercy to us."

We have received acknowledgments of answered prayers also from Mrs. J. H., Mrs. M. B. L., Friend, M. A. B., H. M. E. and E. L. C.

Among the individual requests are 112 for bodily healing; blessing, 12; spiritual advancement, 11; peace, 5; guidance, 6; financial success, 4; and for the conversion of relatives and friends, 56.

The Best

costs a penny

When you think of cost of living think of this:

The best breakfast dish in the world—Quaker Oats—costs only one cent per serving. Dishes which cost from 8 to 15 times that cannot compare with oats.

Quaker Oats yield in nutriment 1810 calories per pound, while round steak yields 890.

The oat is well-balanced. It contains 16 needed elements. As a body-builder and a vim-food it holds a unique place.

If it cost ten times a meat dish you would be wise to serve it. But the meat foods average ten times Quaker Oats.

Compare the waste and nutriment. Compare the calory cost—the energy measure of food value.

You will see why authorities urge that oats be served at least once daily.

Make Quaker Oats your basic breakfast all the time.

Serve the costlier foods at dinner and let the oat-dish average down the cost.

Quaker Oats

with that world-famed flavor

Quaker Oats are flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oats. We get but ten pounds from a bushel.

Millions of oat lovers, the world over, have been won by this extra flavor. Be sure you get it, for it costs no extra price.

MRS. A. S., Emmet, Idaho, writes: "I am convinced that one thing needful and one that is largely overlooked, is the teaching of the Sabbath school children to pray individually. I mean, teaching them to lead their class in prayer, and to repeat the prayer at home on their knees. This will of itself help to set up an altar in the home."

The suggestion is timely. We recall a home in which family prayer was an all-around exercise, and a most delightful one. The little home group, with perhaps a visitor included, went on their knees, quite informally. Then the father, or perhaps the mother, or a daughter, would lead with a short simple petition. Then a pause, and another of the group would be heard and still another, and the visitor felt that he, too, should have a share in such simple pleadings, and joined accordingly. At the conclusion, when the father said a few words and "Amen" came from his lips, all rose and every face reflected the pleasure that had been felt in the exercise. Such a scene, with the earnest little voices pleading and praising and giving thanks for blessings, can never be forgotten. The atmosphere of that homelike room was charged with the Spirit, and one could see by the shining faces all around him, that everyone had followed the invitation "Cast thy burden on the Lord and He shall sustain thee," and had risen in renewed strength and confidence.

A Reader in Denver, Colo., writes relative to the recent article in this paper on "The Religious Training of the Young": "With the article in question I have all hearty sympathy and would have all the good things done that it calls for. It is admitted that the public-school question is full of difficulties in that direction. But even the best work possible in such schools, while it ought to be done, would not begin to accomplish what is needed. When what is called for in the article is actually carried out, it would still leave a great deal that would have to be done in the home or not at all. It would be simply five short services each week in addition to the Sunday school. Many children, especially those from godly homes, would attend the meetings held in the churches; in the case of exercises held in the schools, such children as would be permitted by their parents would get the good; but in either case a great many would miss the benefit, and the measure of good done would be quite limited. Why not make an appeal to the parents to do all the year 'round, by Christian influence and direct help, what the churches and the schools are doing, or are called on now to do? We have been tremendously influenced in modern education by the teachings of Pestalozzi and Froebel as to teaching methods; but stronger than these, with both was the call to parenthood to do its share, in matters outside of religion, as well as inside of it. This part of their prophecy we have missed, because the craze of today is to find out how to get rid of all individual responsibility in parenthood, and land it in the hands of some professional workers, whether within the Church or beyond it. Will you not write a call to parenthood at large to come into a full participation in the best work in the world; and as Froebel used to say: 'Let us live with and for our children?'"

We quite agree with this writer that nothing can be so effective in the religious training of childhood as the family altar in the home, and that earliest training of all, which the child receives on its mother's knee. Our weekly "Home Service" in the Christian Herald is calculated to become a great helper in re-awakening the religious spirit in the average home. It is not to take the place of regular church services, but to meet the spiritual need in cases where church services are not available.

Mrs. J. S. F., Chicago, Ill., writes: "In your article in the issue of December 18, on Sunday observance, you ask, 'What is the attitude of the Church of today as a whole, toward its young people?' Could you or any of your readers suggest, or tell what young people could do as an outlet for their energies after Sunday school hours and evenings when not wishing to attend church. I shall be anxiously awaiting an answer to this in our Mail-Bag column. I have prayed much and spent many anxious hours over this problem, as I see our youth growing up around us with no regard for God or His day, or the rights of others. As a church worker, I am deeply interested and want to have love and charity and to be helpful to all."

We would be glad to hear what other readers have to say on the points raised in J. S. F.'s letter. They are well deserving of thought.

A. E. G., Lancaster, Pa. You are right when you say that Satan is a great deceiver. His deceptions take many forms, one of these being to inflate the heart of a man with pride and self-importance, so that he imagines himself qualified to judge of others. Nothing is more deceptive than this. It has been said that there is good in all men, if we can only get down to it. "Judge not, that ye be not judged."

Story, Brooklyn, N. Y. We should very much doubt the sincerity of a man who tells us he has no conscience. If the "inward monitor" be so hardened within his breast as to render him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, he is indeed in a desperate case; but one even in his condition may be awakened, and conscience revived and quickened. The prayers and helpfulness of others will do much toward this end.

J. W. B., Belview, Pa. It is an excellent rule, where you are in doubt concerning any amusement, to let it alone. We are responsible not only for our own acts, but for their influence upon others; and we should remember that, while a certain amount of latitude might bring no appreciable harm to ourselves, we might be the means of bringing others, who have not as strong powers of resistance, into serious danger. We believe this to be the true Christian attitude. At the same time, we recognize the fact that youth needs a rational amount of amusement and entertainment, and is entitled to it. Surely there are enough ways to satisfy this need, without choosing means that may prove a snare and a positive danger.

J. H. H., Mt. Morris, Ill. The primitive Church, through a large part of its early experience, was subjected to trials "as by fire." It was persecuted ceaselessly, and save in a few very exceptional places, where conditions were more favorable, it had little opportunity for amusements. The great business of life among its members was the all-important mission of winning others to the Gospel, and this even had to be done almost secretly and at great personal risk. In his wonderful story of "Phaedrus" (Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis) gives a vivid picture of the hard struggles of the early Church, and the perils and persecutions that attended any efforts to win others to "The Way." If any substantial proportion of its followers had been seekers after amusement, the primitive Church could not have made the progress it did.

A. S. B., Omaha, Neb., writes: "I owe, or did owe, a neighbor $1,000. It was borrowed so long ago that it can not now be collected by law. I was then not worth anything financially, but am now worth $1,000. My neighbor and I are both professing Christians, and belong to the same church. He now wants me to pay him, and says the law of God requires every Christian to pay his honest debts, no matter how long they have stood unpaid. We have left this question to your knowledge of what the Scripture recognizes in such a case, and I will act accordingly." To the foregoing, Dr. Sheldon makes this reply: "There is no question that A. S. B. ought to pay this money, which he acknowledges he borrowed of his neighbor. The fact that it is outlawed by time does not release him, for it is a moral obligation that a Christian man ought to meet. Pay your neighbor and square your account with God and man."

Reader, Pinckneyville, Ill. Prayer chain letters, such as you describe, making promises and threats, are of very doubtful utility and should be left severely alone.

M. T., Greensboro, N. C. The expression: "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," is, in substance at least, taken from the writings of Lawrence Sterne, famous more as a novelist than a divine, who used the passage in one of his books, "A Sentimental Journey."

staunchest supporters of the church, and his gratitude for the lifting of that burden from his life knows no bounds.

In the past four months, twenty-two girls who had run away from home and were drifting in the city were returned to their homes through the influence of the clinic and Miss Ferry, the women's worker. A physician is attached to the staff, and those needing his services are given diagnosis and advice free. A lawyer and a dentist are soon to be attached in response to the neighborhood need.

THE church has become a social center where sincere religious life flowers out in terms of human fellowship and helpfulness. Beautiful parlors, complete comfortable rooms, dormitories, shower baths and a laundry are for the helpful use of neighbors and strangers.

The parlors are open all night. During the daylight hours various crowds come and go, greeted by members of the staff, some of whom are always on duty. The parlors provide a place of Christian and homelike atmosphere for lonely persons, and many avail themselves of its hospitality. A number of mature ladies of the parish spend time in the parlors assisting the staff, ready to talk with any lonely girl who comes in. Save at luncheon time, the biggest crowd which gathers in the parlors comes after the theatres and moving-picture shows close at night—between eleven and midnight. Then there is always a bevy of people flowing in and out. Often at midnight there are fifty or more people there.

A feature which meets a very pressing need is the noon-time luncheon, open especially to the girls who work in the various places of business along Broadway. A very good luncheon is served for thirty-five cents, and the "Gray Room" tastefully decorated and comfortably furnished gives a homelike place in which hundreds spend their noon hour. This luncheon club has proved a front porch to the church, for hundreds who come to luncheon and discover the friendly atmosphere, come to the church on Sunday.

THE different features of service which the church carries out are not facts which have been choked down the throat of the community, but are answers to the definite needs which the community itself has requested.

A remarkable instance of the appreciation on the part of the neighborhood of the purpose of the church, was the way in which it responded to the electric sign project. The sign with a Cross which gleams above the other signs in the district, perhaps the largest sign on any church in the world and costing $3,000, was given entirely by the people of the parish. Theatrical managers, actors, hotel proprietors, strangers and neighbors all claimed a share. One man, a Hebrew, gave $500, and has promised $500 a year. The sign actually cost the church less than $100, and is already playing a large part in drawing people to the ministry represented by the gleaming Cross. It is kept lighted all night to guide any homeless wanderer seeking aid, and may be seen keeping lonely vigil when the brilliant "white lights" of Broadway have been extinguished.

The surplus money given for the sign is to be used to provide electric crosses for other institutional churches abroad. One will be erected in Mexico City, and another in Copenhagen. The people at Union have received a new missionary stimulus from the neighborhood. Songs first sung on Broadway are heard in South Africa; dramas and those from seven denominations. One man in a middle Western city has contributed $5,000, payable in five yearly instalments, as an expression of his interest in the enterprise.

A Boys' Club of 250 members, a School of Religion on Sundays and week-days, a Children's Church, a Mothers' Club, a Music School Community Night program for entire families, are among other fruitful activities.

Yes, Union Methodist Episcopal Church, now better known as "Ninety-nine Steps from Broadway," is alive and meeting competition in the theater district, where it was thought a church could not survive. Instead of a doomed and lonely structure soon to be relegated to the scrap-heap because of the mad pleasure-seeking around it, Union Church is more than holding its own. It is progressing rapidly. More than 800 people daily pass in and out of its photoplays which succeed there four the country, entertaining more than 15,000,000 people daily. In time Union Church hopes to have an influence in the judgment of these productions, which means that it plans to attack the problem of clean amusements at its source.

It is interesting to note the financial aspects of the re-birth at Union, especially as it relates to the drawing in of other money which would otherwise not have been secured at all. The budget for the church guaranteed by the Centenary is $25,000 a year, but already an income of $22,500 from contributions and from receipts from the dormitories, etc., has been assured.

Dr. Benson feels that it will be but a short time when the entire budget of the church will be provided without Centenary help. The income from the dormitories and the luncheon, which are entirely self-supporting and making some profits amounting to $10,000 a year, is turned back to the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. Thirty thousand dollars a year has already been given in bona-fide pledges from members and friends of the church, who believe in the type of work it is doing.

As a travelers' church, Union has a distinctive type of organization in its Associate Membership. This body has come into being as a result of the huge transient problem in Union Church parish. Associate Membership is open to any one of any denomination, and involves a payment of only five dollars a year and the pledge to attend the church while in the city. It is for three classes of people: First, Methodists who have business in New York from time to time, but who live away from it and desire a church home in New York City when they come; second, those of any other denomination who believe in this type of work and who desire to help it; and third, a large class of persons who do not feel ready to become active members of the church for doctrinal or other reasons, but who believe in the type of service being rendered and who are willing to help. People from all parts of the earth gather at the Travelers' Bible Discussion Club, meeting at noon on Sunday. At a recent meeting twelve states were represented, and there were present two business men living in Australia, three living in China, and one in Japan.

Already over 238 associate members have been enrolled, including doors, avail themselves of its hospitality, and come under the Christian influence.

Amidst the tinsel of theatrical life and the bustle of the great amusement industry in full swing, the staff at Union Church have found human hearts unusually easy to touch. "I have found it easier to talk to people about God here in this center of theater life than in any parish I have ever known," said Dr. Benson. "After all, we are only trying to unlock the potentialities of the human heart. And the process is not hard once the people see we are trying to practice Christianity as well as talk it. The big problem in the city is to kill the demon of loneliness which makes people draw within themselves. We are trying to kill city loneliness."

Training Country Pastors

SCHOLARSHIPS for rural pastors, which shall aid in fitting them specifically for the country field, now are being offered in Wisconsin and nine ministers form the nucleus of the first group to undertake such work at the University of Wisconsin. Of the nine only one is doing full time work at the University, the others coming in from their charges for the lectures and conferences, the longest trip being sixty-six miles. The pastors are studying economic problems, sociology and various related courses, and are getting in close touch with the problems on the farm.

The leader of the group is E. Tetrau, of the department of agricultural economics of the University and the pastor of a country parish forty-four miles from Madison. "The aim of this work," Mr. Tetrau explained, "is to get the rural pastor in close touch with his College of Agriculture, and at the same time to provide another means for getting the work of the college and state to the pastor and his parish. It is not in any way a denominational program, despite the fact that a few denominations have donated the funds to begin the movement. It is a movement from the viewpoint of the man on the soil who wants to see the church in the open country function as it should and will."

Plans are under way for the extension of the movement next summer and it is the intention to offer special short courses lasting three or four weeks which will enable the rural pastors of the state to obtain a broader outlook on agricultural problems and to strengthen leadership in their communities.

OFFER NO. E THE CALL OF THE BELLS

"THE CALL OF THE BELLS," by Edmund Mitchell, is a wonderful story, and he has built about it pathos, sentiment and romance of a quality, character and eloquence such as is seldom found in books.

The story deals with such vital national issues as the reconciliation of capital and labor, the regeneration of the idle rich, the reclamation of the hobo, the dignity of toil, the moral strength of temperance, and the more equitable distribution of wealth, comfort and happiness—these are among the big themes woven into the warp and woof of a throbbing story of human passions and frailties, vices and virtues, aspiration, struggle, and achievement. And through all runs the golden thread of optimism—the triumph of love and brotherhood and mutual helpfulness.

"Be Brief" Is the Motto of Chileans and Argentines

South America

The Fourth Article in a Series on "New Worlds"

By WILLARD PRICE

I SAT in the office of a South American magazine in Santiago, waiting for the editor to complete his business and fulfill his offer to take me about the city.

My eyes wandered over the very modern appurtenances of the office—the typewriter, the dictaphone, the telephone, the adding machine of a clerk behind a glass partition.

These did not surprise me so much as a framed motto over the editor's desk. It read, "Sea U. Breve," which, being interpreted, means, "Be Brief!"

"Be Brief!" It was the first time since leaving New York that I had discovered any inclination on the part of anyone to speed up the wheels of progress.

The mottos of tropical and sub-tropical Latin America are the famous "Mañana" (Tomorrow) and "Paciencia" (Patience). But when one has left behind Central America, Venezuela, Colombia and the other lands of unperturbed repose, and has reached a latitude in the southern hemisphere about equal to that of New York in the northern hemisphere, he notices a zest in the air and in the people which reminds him of home.

The Chileans have been called the Yankees of South America. The term might well be extended to include the Argentines as well. Chile and Argentina lie side by side in the temperate zone, and both the climate and the natural resources offer good reason why these should be two of the most progressive and aggressive nations in Latin America.

The common expressions of nations are significant. Probably the most common expression among North Americans is "All right!" Few of us realize how many times a day we say it. Natives of foreign lands often understand no English except the two words they hear most often from tourist Americans—and mischievous boys in any land from China to Patagonia will run after the American traveler crying, "All right! All right!" We need not be ashamed of the expression. It denotes an optimistic, agreeable, go-ahead spirit.

Among the South American Yankees the expression "Be Brief" is common in signs—but, of course, it is too abrupt to be used in speech. The most common spoken expression is as amiable as our own. It is, "¿Como no?" (Why not?) A hundred times a day one hears it. Ask a Chilean or Argentine for assistance and he will not be so likely as his northern brother to invite you to patience or request you to wait until tomorrow. The chances are that, with a blithe "¿Como no?" he will go directly to work.

FOR these people are accustomed to work. Their pioneer ancestors discovered a wild and austere country peopled by savage tribes. Only by toil and courage were the Araucanian Indians driven back (they were never conquered) and the land made to produce.

The Spanish who had gone to the torrid zone had found a very different land and a different type of Indian. There the land brought forth abundantly. Most of the Indian tribes were submissive and industrious. They were set to till the soil, while the Spanish lived at ease upon the fruit of their labor. The reflex result was that the Spanish fiber was softened and weakened by idleness. Thus was exemplified the truth of the saying, "If you put a chain about the neck of another human being, you fasten the other end of the chain about your own neck."

But, in temperate South America, the invaders found no willing slaves, and the soil, although fertile, would not yield a living except through hard work and plenty of it. Thus a vigorous, self-reliant people was developed. Although the land was not so rich as that in many other parts of the continent, yet Argentina and Chile, through industry, have managed to pile up enormous wealth. The American millionaire who does Europe and spends money like water is nowadays not necessarily from New York or Chicago. He is almost as likely to be from Buenos Aires or Santiago.

The wealth of Chile is made chiefly through a single business—the business of supplying the world with the sinews of war. We recently had a Great War. It would have been impossible but for Chile. The dozen petty wars now in progress would have to stop if Chile did not supply the wherewithal for their continuance.

War depends upon explosive ammunition. Explosive ammunition depends absolutely upon nitric acid, and the huge supply of nitric acid which is necessary comes almost entirely from the nitrate fields of Chile. The sodium nitrate of the Chilean pampas makes it possible for the guns of the world to speak.

THE most colossal war in the world's history depended upon a little strip of desert in northern Chile. Germany well understood this fact. For years before the war she purchased annually forty-two per cent. of Chile's total production of nitrate. This enormous quantity was bought ostensibly to be used as fertilizer, and, in fact, much of it was so used. But also much of it was systematically stored away for the manufacture of ammunition; so that, when the cloudburst came, Germany had on hand a vast supply of explosives and of nitrates from which explosives could be made.

With the beginning of war she was, of course, promptly cut off from communication with Chile. She began experiments on a huge scale to develop the manufacture of nitric acid through the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen in order to augment the supply she had stored away. She found, however, that this process was extremely expensive and extremely slow. So she devised an additional scheme. Since it was impossible for her to get more Chilean nitrate, she would make it also impossible for the Allies to get it.

German plot was revealed, having for its object nothing less than the destruction of the machinery in all the nitrate oficinas of Chile.

The plot was to be consummated on February 26 (the same date as that set for the attempt, which proved futile, to steal the Peruvian submarines). Charges well placed under boilers and at other vulnerable points would have wrecked machinery that it would have taken at least a year and a half to replace.

Of course guards were immediately detailed and the plan was abandoned. But if the plot had succeeded, what then? In a few months the existing supply of nitrate in the hands of the Allies would have been exhausted. The manufacture of ammunition, except in Germany, would have stopped.

Strenuous efforts would have been made by the Allies to develop the synthetic method of manufacturing nitric acid from the nitrogen of the air—an industry in which Germany had already had three years start. The few feeble synthetic plants in France, England, the United States and elsewhere had never accomplished any success of real importance. And during the necessary tests, experiments and failures, during the interval before the Allies could bring the new industry to any adequate strength, Germany would have her great opportunity.

IT IS a commentary upon the forgetfulness of governments that, now that the war is over, most of the Allied nations, including the United States, have practically ceased the effort to fixate atmospheric nitrogen. But Germany is assiduously developing the method. In case of future trouble, there will be only one great Power with an independent supply of nitrate. The rest of us will again be dependent upon Chile.

It is wonderful for Chile! Millionaires multiply, rates of exchange sing, the government is happy and opulent. Seventy per cent. of the government's total revenue is derived from the export tax on nitrate!

This fountain of wealth, enriching Chile, devastating Europe, flows out of a bleak desert where not a shrub grows, and rain falls once in about thirty years. That a desert is not necessarily to be regarded as waste land has been stupendously proved in Chile. At the close of the war with Bolivia and Peru in 1879, those countries yielded to Chile the arid provinces of Antofagasta, Tarapacá and Tacna, and considered that they got off easily. That region has

The government and business buildings of Buenos Aires are of stone and marble, designed to respond to the Latin demand for beauty. Any city might well be proud of this structure, Argentina's Congressional building

The outcome of this reasoning was a plot, the story of which never got to most North Americans, but which I found to be well known in South America. But for the tell-tale wagging of a drunken man's tongue, the war might have come to a conclusion of a sort far more pleasing to the Kaiser.

One day in February of 1917 a Chilean miner came down from the nitrate pampas to the coast town of Antofagasta. He had money. He visited a cantina and in time became drunk—only garrulous. His babblings made his listeners sit up sharply and exchange glances, and later report to the authorities.

An investigation followed and a stupendous now become infinitely the most valuable part of Chile.

It is the generally accepted theory that this desert plain, or pampa, as it is called, was originally below sea level. As it was gradually raised, immense quantities of seaweed were exposed to the air, and there decayed, the bacteria becoming nitrified and sodium nitrate being formed.

Ordinarily this deposit would soon be washed away by the rain—but here there was no rain. Consequently there lies under the blown sand of the pampa, a stratum called "caliche," varying from a few inches to sixteen feet in thickness and composed of rich, nitrate-bearing earth.

Holes are bored into the stratum, slow-burning powder is introduced and the "caliche" blasted into fragments which are carried on carts to the oficina or leaching works, there to be crushed and dissolved in boiling water. The hot, saturated solution is drawn off into vats and allowed to crystallize. The crystals, when dried, are ready for packing and shipment. They contain ninety-five to ninety-six per cent. of sodium nitrate.

The deposits are immense and are variously estimated to be sufficient to last from seventy to one hundred years more, even at the present rate of production. With such a resource, together with native ingenuity and shrewdness, the full purse of Chile is assured for a long time to come.

THE wealth of Argentina lies in cattle and crops. A successful cattle country must be spacious. Chile is pinched. She is a shoestring republic—as long as from New York to San Francisco, but as narrow as Lake Erie. This extraordinary shape is due to the fact that she occupies the narrow strip between the Andes and the coast. But Argentina is expansive. She has eight million people whereas, if all her territory were occupied as densely as is that of Japan, she would accommodate 342 million.

Our American farms seem diminutive compared with those of Argentina. There the farm of 200,000 acres is common. Many are twice that size, and there is a record of at least one three times as large. It is not unusual for a whole day to be consumed on the train in crossing the land of a single proprietor.

The old cow-puncher days of our West are being repeated here. Looking from the window of the train one may often count twenty thousand cattle within an hour. Also he will see thousands of sheep and scores of ostriches. But one thing he will not see; Barns. In a land where it is not too cold for animals to be out all the year round, and where there is no need to cut and store hay because hay grows twelve months in the year, barns are unnecessary.

At every station one will see corrals and pens for convenience in loading the cattle cars. Every day trains from all parts of the republic arrive at the great packing plants near Buenos Aires with their burden of restless animals.

I VISITED one plant which daily kills and packs twenty-five hundred cattle, two thousand sheep and twelve hundred hogs. The horns of the cattle are cut off to be used in the making of buttons and combs, the skins are future shoes, the skulls are ground up into meal for hogs, the casings are sent to become the skins of sausages, the blood dries into black-purple cinders, and I saw hills of it thirty feet high waiting to be shipped away and used as fertilizer.

So swift is the process of killing, sawing, cutting, washing, drying and weighing, that, ten minutes after an animal has walked under the hammer, he is hanging in halves in the cooler and beginning to freeze.

That is the way the southern "Yankees" work. But who are these Argentine "Yankees"? I noted the face and speech of the workers in this plant. Many of the men on the killing floor were Russians. Brawny Scandinavians went by pushing huge trucks. German girls—curious anomaly!—were canning meat for the French Government. Everywhere there were Italians, scores of them, and hundreds of Spanish. And the men in the cooler were Arabs, who are best adapted to this work. Curious that the riders of the blazing Sahara should find themselves most at home in the refrigerator!

The truth is that the greatest republic of the south temperate zone is, like the greatest republic of the north temperate zone, a Mecca for immigrants from all over the world. The citizens of Argentina, like the citizens of the United States, are of all complexions and races. Both countries are composite nations. Both are marked by the enterprise of old blood of many strains pioneering in a new land. Therefore it is not strange that of all the people of Latin America, the Argentines, the ones most remote

The underground stations, in contrast with our own dingy caverns, are as fresh as white tile can make them, and blaze with light and color. The cars are gray like milady's limousine and have spacious, plate-glass windows and comfortable seats, and are attractively lighted. The city, both in its public and private aspects, responds to the Latin demand for beauty.

It is the most cosmopolitan city in the world, not even excepting New York. The language is being affected by the conglomeration of nationalities. Italian words, French, German, even Yiddish are being wedged into the basic Spanish. English words, sometimes oddly revised in spelling, have been added; such as "rosbif," "bifte," "panqueque," "futbol," "Yanqui," "sandwichs" and "lunch minutas." It is fascinating to see a new speech and a new people in the making, as in Argentina.

IN ALL this furor of new life, progress and hope, there is one dead thing—religion. The curse in northern South America is superstition, which is a distortion of religion. But the trouble in the south is even more hopeless—atheism, which is absence of religion.

Out of five thousand students in the University of Buenos Aires, only four men reported any belief in God.

Of the one and two-thirds million people in Buenos Aires it is doubtful if there are more than three hundred men on any given Sunday at service.

"Religion!" the South American leader will say to you. "The sooner we are rid of it entirely, the better. Religion has blocked our progress; bred our revolutions, and been the cause of the illiteracy of more than half of our people. In the name of progress, deliver us from religion!"

It is not religion which has done these things. It is the Church and the priests who have grossly misinterpreted religion. But in condemning these, the critics do not discriminate, and condemn religion in general.

"God is a myth," said a South American university professor in the course of a lecture to his class. "He has no reality, he is not an object of science. Astronomy, with Laplace, has invaded the heavenly fields and in all celestial space there has not been found a kingdom of God. We are in the realm of realism."

The lightness with which religious things are regarded is indicated by the startling irreverence of expression in these lands.

Over the shops one is apt to find such signs as "Butcher Shop of the Holy Ghost," "Furniture Shop of the Savior." A certain bottled water is called "Jesus Water," and a famous port wine sells under the label, "Tears of Christ." On Good Friday a magazine carried a picture representing Christ in the foreground, Judas and others in the background, smoking a certain brand of cigarette. Judas is saying, "If I had had such cigarettes to smoke, I should not have betrayed Him."

THROUGH lack of a Church which will spread dynamic religious belief, the people are without idealism. Materialism is in the saddle.

Here is a stupendous task for organized Christianity. The task is not only to carry in an unadulterated Gospel, but to regenerate the existing Church if it can be regenerated. The South American, themselves frequently say, "The only means of reforming the Church is the spur of Protestant competition."

Whatever is good in the Roman Catholic Church should be conserved and developed. But that Church has had its opportunity and must now be not only "spurred" but reinforced by a powerful Christian onslaught undertaken by other forces.

But if these lands are so prosperous and progressive, why is religion necessary? The answer lies in the fact that the ancestors of these people were Christian. A nation may continue to live for some time on its old ideals, just as a man may live for some weeks upon the strength of one meal. But the time of reckoning is sure to come. If the nation does not rebuild its ideals as fast as the old ones decay, there will come a time, as in the history of Egypt, Greece and Rome, when the empty shell of civilization will crumble because of the weakening of character—which alone makes civilization possible.

A square in Santiago, Chile, a city of hustle, where the motto "Be Brief" reminds the American of home from us, are the ones with whom we have most in common.

MORE than half the population of Argentina is made up of immigrants or the children of immigrants who have arrived there within the last fifty years.

As the world's greatest immigrant nation after the United States, Argentina maintains at Buenos Aires a second Ellis Island. A great "immigrants' hotel" receives the influx. There the nature of the country is explained to the newcomers. Every effort is made to persuade them not to settle in Buenos Aires, but to go on into the interior where they are needed on the farms. There is an exhibit of farm machinery, and every evening illustrated lectures depict the joys and contentment of farm life—while care is taken to say nothing and show no picture that will increase the lure of the city. Free transportation to any part of Argentina is offered.

Sacking and loading nitrate, the industry which has made Chile a land of millionaires

There is no doubt about the lure of the capital city. Buenos Aires is the third largest city in the western hemisphere. Only New York and Chicago outnumber it. In the early days it was called a "plaster imitation of Paris" but the expression is no longer correct. It is a very solid imitation. In most other South American cities the façades and columns of government and business buildings are still of plaster—in Buenos Aires today they are of stone and marble. The city is no longer a boom town. It is an established metropolis with an individuality of its own.

AND if the hats and gowns of Buenos Aires are imitations, at least they are six months ahead of the originals! Since summer here comes six months earlier than in France, the Parisian customer is wont to try out his creations here before submitting them to the more severe test of Paris.

Buenos Aires is beautiful, even to its subways.

The College Man a Christian Asset

A Discussion of the Meaning of Education

WHEN we speak of college education or of the higher education, we speak of that which means many and diverse things to men of many minds. It touches life at how many different points, and from how many different angles.

It is the passing on from one generation to another of the finer acquisitions of our civilization. It is the meeting together of young lives for leisurely fellowship just before they plunge into the serious business of life, and like all wholesome young intercourse and leisure, it finds its most vigorous expression in athletics. It is training for efficiency in an age which bestows on efficiency its medal of honor. It is science growing every day more scientific and finding its focus in the laboratory. It is the forming and polishing of a gentleman, that he may meet and deal with gentlemen on their own level, speaking their common language. It is the discipline of thought and the liberalizing of opinion to the end that its graduates may comprehend the rounded and unselfish ideals of human society, and may defend them skillfully, without solicism and without confusion.

It is essentially the cultivation of taste, that one may discriminate between the better and the worse, between what is vulgar and what is admirable, applying standards gained from acquaintanceship with the best. It is an investment, time, cost, toil, and speculation, which may yield a larger return than any like investment which the market affords. It is a spiritual adventure in which one shall risk the failure and the friendly securities of childhood and face the full-grown duties of manhood, going forward in the perilous ways of knowledge and understanding.

It is one or another of these widely different things which commands attention according to the bent of the mind which is intent upon considering it and describing it.

For the young alumnus, it is likely to mean fraternity life and athletics, framed in a beloved campus and seen through quickly gathering mists of tender memory. For the man of business, or the engineer, it is a costly mechanism which might be made to produce much greater results than it has ever produced. For the journalist it is—it is all manner of things, on occasion; an object of veneration, that you can poke fun at, as you can not do with the Church; an institution of society that has some charm of irresponsible youth about it, unlike the solemnities of State and the world of politics. For the politician it is much or nothing, according to his type of politics, a something between his hope and his despair. For the Churchman it is the potential champion of the very Kingdom of God, while it is itself beset with weakness and peril.

HOW great is its possible weakness and peril was written across the clouds in that declaration which the recognized leaders of the German universities gave forth to the world in support of the entrance of their empire upon the war of ages. When university science has come to its highest development, the ethical spirit of the universities suddenly met with the most terrible test, and under that strain it broke disastrously. Remembrance of that failure must teach the lesson of humility; it must remind us that institutions of learning everywhere should loom to their own soundness of spirit, if they would teach mankind beyond the routine of their classes and curricula.

It is clear that the colleges and universities must be free if they would exercise any such leadership. President Wheeler once remarked that universities are the freest institutions we have—the only institutions that are altogether free. In so far as this is true, they are the institutions best fitted for moral leadership. They cannot make any real contribution to the moral betterment of the world except as they are free.

By freedom we do not mean uncontrolled, but controlled from within rather than from without. But the release from external control, whether in the case of men or of nations or of institutions, is no more than one part in ten of genuine freedom. Four parts at least are made up of knowledge and intelligence, and five parts of sheer responsibility. Knowledge of mankind and their history, intelligence to comprehend that all-embracing psychology which masters human affairs, and responsibility which acknowledges indebtedness to the past and obligations to the present and future.

Such freedom is not a possession. It is an achievement. It is to be achieved anew in every generation, every year, every day of the year. It is the work of men, the work of men sufficiently competent and clean to hold the confidence of their fellowmen. The main problem of our higher education is that of getting such men for our professorships and holding them after we have got them. This is not chiefly a problem of salaries. The salaries of such men do not have to be luxuriant. They have to be decent—that is all. Men who can be held at teaching only by salaries which will compete with those in the commercial world, are not men who will transform and inspire the lives of their students. The teachers who will send forth graduates on fire with holy zeal and capable of winning the world through the grace of sacrifice, they are the teachers who are themselves self-sacrificing, whose guiding star shines far above their horizon. But we must keep them above degrading sacrifices. They must be paid a decent wage, that they may live in and for their teaching.

THE obvious and insistent demand now made upon our universities is that they shall promote industrial efficiency. This demand is bringing to the front certain and practical and professional aspects of our education. At the present moment, I suppose the departments of our universities which are developing most rapidly are those of engineering, commerce, medicine. Perhaps two or three more should be added to the list. Let us not, in our idealism, put aside the demand for an efficient product, as merely sordid and material.

How does a good man serve his age and advance the Kingdom of Righteousness? Chiefly through the way in which he performs his daily tasks. There are times of crisis when he must drop his accustomed tools and go to war. There are many things that he will be called upon to do for the public good in his leisure hours. There are some men, but they are a minority, whose calling in life is purely public and spiritual. For the great majority of men, the major part of their time and thought must be devoted to some ordinary occupation through which they gain their livelihood.

Education accomplishes one of its most supreme ends when it fits a man to meet great emergencies with great resource and steadfastness. It accomplishes an end of no mean value when it fits a man to use his leisure generously and high-mindedly. But it has failed to accomplish the end of commonest and most universal significance unless it fits men to be great workmen in their daily occupation.

Our technical and professional schools must accordingly be a prime consideration in our appraisal of the higher education. It is the business of these schools to save us from a functionless intelligence. In so far as their teaching lays its stress upon sordid aims, upon a goal of unethical success, they fail to contribute to the solidarity of our social life. But a technical or professional school of this kind is nothing less than an anachronism. As these schools become more scientific, their aims and influence would naturally tend to become more coherent with the general welfare. Good teaching accentuates this tendency and interprets it in explicit principles. A public service of untold value is daily performed by teachers in our university schools of the various occupations and vocations, who are bringing home to their students, in concrete terms, the lesson that their life-work is to be, not for themselves alone, but for the common good.

SCIENCE, physical and biological, is the most costly branch of our modern education. The requirement of our laboratories and more laboratory equipment is the despair of trustees and of the officers of administration. We must confidently expect these requirements to go on expanding and the spread of scientific method to other departments to continue. Let there be no doubt that it is worth the cost—not always and in every particular, for there is the possibility of unnecessary elaboration, but in the broad and large, unquestionably worth the cost.

It would be too long a tale to unfold the ways in which the rigorous lessons of laboratory science contribute to the higher interest of humanity. They pretty generally come back to the simple spirit and patience and habit of getting at the truth for no private or ulterior purpose but simply because it is truth.

Truth is not all. Beauty is its eternal counterpart. "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us that He may establish the work of our hands upon us." Not things but the worth of things, not activities but values. The sense that the difference between better and worse is a difference that matters supremely. I sometimes think that we should not be far astray if we set before us as the chief end of our education the attainment of a discriminating preference for the things that are the best.

This is the field of judgment, in which the student is to make his individual opinion with the enlightened discernments of mankind. We call that the master-work in art, in achievement, in devotion, which has received the deliberate approval of the generations—a master-work, and worthy at least of some provisional acceptance and veneration by even the most adventurous and self-sufficient of the young generation.

The enthusiasms and innovations of the hour are immature till they have come under the ripening sunlight of an experience older than that of any one generation. This is perhaps the most formative lesson taught, with impressive examples, by our professors of the humanities. It is a hard lesson for impetuous youth to learn.

IN COLLEGE as in the world at large, no man is educated till he has educated himself. In the campus activities of students, in their athletics and their college politics, they are doing for themselves what no formal classroom can do for them.

In the most secular institutions, they maintain their own religious organization, and there you will find frequent meetings of those who come together for independent study of the scriptures, those whose lives are already dedicated to the Christian ministry, those who are looking forward with all the adventure of pioneers and explorers, to their destined career as missionaries in the dark places of the earth.

If happiness is attained by indirection rather than by direct assault, so it may often be with the Kingdom of God. I have emphasized those aspects of our higher education which seem unrelated to the Christian crusade. It is because I do not believe that they are essentially unrelated, but that all which makes for truth, for beauty, and for righteousness is fundamentally the ally of the Christian spirit.

I might tell much concerning more immediate connections. The courses of instruction in the Bible, church history and related topics, libraries, chapels, chaplaincies, maintained by different universities and colleges. They are numerous and important. Generally it must be said that in our larger non-Catholic institutions at least the complete integration of explicitly religious elements with the other elements of the academic life is yet to be attained. The reticence as regards religious themes which is characteristic of our modern society, is reflected in our institutions of learning. The reason, I believe, is not irreligion but sectarianism. When the reunion of the thought and sentiment of Christendom shall be further advanced, then we may hope that in our universities and in our life and literature at large, there may be a more adequate development of these studies and teachings which relate to the highest aspirations and traditions of our common civilization.

Dr. Sheldon Says

The Program of Life:

1. Begins with a true definition of Life itself.
2. Has a definite end in view and never loses sight of it.
3. Recognizes the fact that other human beings with their programs are involved in the shaping of ours.
4. Takes account of a just proportion of things; giving place for work, play, love, religion, worship, meditation, friendship, God.
5. Cannot be carried out successfully without co-operation. Here the other people come into our scheme of things and must be consulted.
6. Is not complete without the love of man and woman, the kind sanctioned and blessed by the Divine Home lover.
7. Calls for quiet thought, for faith in the unseen, for joy in common tasks, for prayer when the day's work is done.
8. Is not a wise program if old people are shut out of it—the care of them, the love for them, the quiet sitting beside their quiet lives. Our ships must sometimes come in off the tempestuous sea and let the sails fill with the harbor breeze.
9. Has a place in it for good books, for old home music, for the beautiful things that are not for sale, for the old things that cannot be bought.
10. If the Program has God at the beginning it will have His strength in the middle and His Heaven at the end.

With this group of happy youngsters as a part of its clientele, do you wonder that the Union League Boys' Club gives the impression of boys, boys everywhere?

A Business Investment in Boys

Chicago Men Find Dividends in Grins on Urchin Faces

By S. J. DUNCAN-CLARK

INVESTMENT in the under-privileged boy is a matter of plain business economy. It can be sold to any man who is willing to think seriously about it for a few minutes, if he be open to arguments that appeal to sound judgment, to intelligent self-interest, to recognition of the fact that his own affairs are inseparable from those of the community in which he lives.

Every service-giving or producing member of the community must bear his proportional part of the cost involved in caring for its human waste. The cost of waste is always greater than the cost of conservation. This is true in material things. It is equally true in dealing with that most valuable of all things—human life.

Let us consider a moment the under-privileged boy as a potential liability. His home conditions are poor; parental care and guidance may be well intentioned, but are often unwise and spasmodic. The street and the alley are his playground. He becomes at an early age a member of the gang, whose leader is respected because of his cleverness in anti-social activities, his daring in defiance of authority, his slick evasions of law, his boasted contempt for the teacher, the policeman and every other symbol of order and discipline.

His juvenile years are marked merely by minor peccadilloes, neighborhood annoyance, small thefts, excursions into vice which are more serious in their portent than in their immediate consequences. But he is forming habits, acquiring a viewpoint and developing a character which, if there be no influence to intervene and check, will sooner or later make him a direct charge upon the community.

The total of the loss and cost, due to social neglect of this bit of human material, cannot be expressed in dollars, but it is evident that to speak of such a boy as a "total loss" is to fall far short of the actual fact. He is more than a loss; he is an item of continuing expense. Society is not only deprived of what he might have contributed to its wealth and welfare; it must pay for all that he destroys, and it must bear the burden of his maintenance during the whole of his career.

JUDGE ARNOLD, of the Chicago Juvenile Court, recently made the statement that the Juvenile Court and its related machinery, including the institutions which must take care of those who pass through its hands, costs the taxpayers of Cook County and Chicago $1,500,000 a year. How much better and saner to spend some of this money in preventive work, in reaching the boy before he becomes a law-breaker!

A year ago the Union League Club of Chicago, an organization of men who know what "plain business economy" means, considered this argument and found itself thoroughly sold on the proposition. The vision took form in its mind of a club for boys which would meet the under-privileged lad in his own neighborhood and on his own ground of interest, and, thus establishing a sympathetic and helpful contact, would lead him into habits and occupations resulting in the development of a useful, self-respecting citizenship.

The Union League Club of Chicago has behind it the same traditions which attach to that name wherever it is used in the United States; it has the same aims. It exists to maintain and protect the integrity and perpetuity of the American nation. The Club went at the new task it had set for itself as business men would go at any straightforward business proposition.

Experts were called in and consulted. The field was surveyed carefully. A location was sought where the raw material for the new enterprise would be abundant and accessible. It was found on Chicago's west side, in a polyglot community, where families huddled in tenements and basements, and boy life overflowed everywhere into the streets and alleys. The Juvenile Court showed a big percentage of clients from this neighborhood. The policemen on the beats testified to the existence of a problem which transcended their power.

Here was discovered a big and commodious vacant building. In former days it had been a social center of doubtful character—a dance hall and saloon—the scene of many a clamorous night. The building was bought. It became the property of the Union League Foundation, and the home of the Union League Boys' Club.

I said these business men had consulted experts. They had done more. They had secured the services of an expert, a man whose life had been spent in studying the boy—not as an abstract, theoretical proposition, but as a living, human, moldable material. He had lived with boys; he knew them from the outside in and the inside out. What is better, he believed in them.

So these business men, satisfied that they had found a man who knew the job, and who had the ability, energy and character to handle it, turned it over to him.

AND so the other night, after the Union League Boys' Club had been in business as a going concern for about nine months, I went over to the west side—to Nineteenth and Leavitt Streets—to see what this man had done.

On the pavement immediately in front of the building, from whose windows beamed a cheerful glare, I encountered four or five youngsters, typical of their kind. They gave me keen scrutiny. I was suspected of being the band instructor, of whom one of them said, "He is a thin, long feller." The description fitted me, but I had to disclaim the honor. When I said I was looking for Mr. Klees, I was at once offered an escort. Under competent guidance I found the man who is playmate, comrade and friendly mentor for 1,000 little roughnecks. He, too, is a "thin, long feller," with a kindly, half-quizzical smile, and a voice that can be sympathetic or authoritative as occasion requires.

Mr. Klees took me in tow, and we toured the building, while I asked questions and he talked. Boys were everywhere, in every room, in every hall and lobby, on every stairway. One got an impression of squirming, irrepressible life and noise.

On the first floor boys came and went through the street door with unhindered freedom. There was no doorman to ask their business, no ceremony or inquisition to take the edge off the welcome. The lobby led directly into a big room where there were half a dozen billiard tables, every one of which had its full quota of players, and its crowd of loquacious spectators. To the right of it an adjoining room was filled with little lads gathered about tables intent on games, picture puzzles, map puzzles, or the building of many and wonderful things from construction toys. A young woman moved quietly among them, patting a towed head, or speaking a word of praise to some puzzle-solver, or admiring the latest production of a youthful genius.

On the floor above is the gymnasium, and rooms in which the discussion groups meet on their appointed nights. Let us take a glance at the gymnasium. It is a spacious room, fully equipped for its purpose, with a stage at one end, which is used for entertainments and where the dramatic group presents its interpretations of carefully chosen plays.

But there is always something doing in the gymnasium—indoor baseball, basket ball, drills with and without apparatus, and the acrobatics of the pyramid group, whose ability to climb upon one another's shoulders and balance in symmetrical tableaux is the wonder and admiration of the boys' agile. All of this work is done under the supervision of an instructor who makes his chief aim the development of the instincts of fair-play, decency and team-work. The code of the floor bars the tricky and mean, and the boy who cannot keep his temper, or who tries to star-

This building, once a dance hall and saloon, is the home of the Union League Boys' Club and a center for character building at the expense of co-operation, soon learns the folly of such tactics.

UP ANOTHER flight of stairs the drum and bugle corps was audibly engaged. The bandmaster had arrived, and was letting his twosome pupils work off some of their superfluous energy before attempting to fasten their attention on the serious business of learning to read music from the blackboard. Here I witnessed a miracle. This tactful instructor, himself little beyond boyhood, at the right moment resolved order out of chaos and silence out of tumult. How he did it, I cannot tell. That he did it, I know. I watched him writing notes on the board, his back turned to his ragamuffin crowd, while forty youngsters maintained a quiet among themselves which would have done credit to any assembly of business men.

Then he led them through the reading of the score, and later through its translation into the roll and rat-tat of the drums. Those unruly urchins of the crowded streets and alleys were going through a discipline, unconsciously, which meant far more to them than the mere achievement of skill in using their drum-sticks.

But the game-rooms, the gymnasium, the drum and bugle corps and other attractions described do not exhaust the activities of the Club. Indeed they merely touch the surface. They are the pulling features—to which should be added the Saturday night movie shows, always patronized by big and enthusiastic audiences.

Three discussion groups have been organized, each limited to a membership of 35. In these groups the youngsters, from the littlest boys up, are being taught to conduct their own public meetings, to observe rules or order and to discuss intelligently matters of common interest. The Websterian and the Franklin, by their names, indicate the ambitions of the youthful debaters; the Pioneers suggests a more venturesome group, from which may yet come some leader on

The Prohibition Fight in Europe

A Great Revival Is Needed to Insure Victory

By PAUL RADER

SCOTLAND has just about finished her vote on license, but it was an overwhelming vote for license, if one counts the votes only as to numbers. They counted in other ways, however.

The methods of fighting were very peculiar to one like myself, who was State Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League for some time and had first-hand knowledge of the tricks of the liquor men. The fight looked to an outsider like a match between two heavy-weights—one with science and ring tactics well developed and his fight planned, hammering away at a big, healthy, heavy hitter, willing to take punishment, but unschooled in delivering his blows and in guarding. It was a contest which would lead you to pity the clever opponent in a later fight after the heavy-hitting lad had been trained in the art of boxing.

The heavy-hitting Christian life of Scotland, awkward and earnest, went down this time before the old booze crowd, schooled in the election art, but it will not be that way for long. The dries have gone to their corner defeated, breathing heavily, but with heads still unbowed, and they left their hats in the ring. They will be back, those Scots; they are down, but they will never be "oot." They do not start fast; they take long, slow swings from the hip, but they will soon learn the short, inside fighting blows, and the clean-up will look like washday after a real Scotch Sunday.

Then, too, they went to war just as they were, without any training for the fray. We taught the children in the public schools of America, for years, the awful effects of alcohol on the body and brain and soul. This long training in the schools—thanks to the W. C. T. U.—was a factor which counted mightily in old John Barleycorn's defeat at the hands of the American people. It proved again that exact information is the first law of efficiency. Steam, behind facts, makes a wrecking cannon ball. Scotland needs to teach her people the facts. When she does, the steam which she had in her pistons in this election, without any increased force, will win the day.

Speaking of election leads me to say that the liquor men gained a great point by mixing the issue before the people. If, as in some cases, the polls had been open on this one question of license or no license, the vote would have greatly changed. The question was "Change," "No Change," "Modification," and with men to be elected at the same time. The change, even though it had won, would not have closed the hotels, cafés and clubs of the rich. This made a class issue. The rich man could have gotten his liquor, but the poor man and the workingman would have been denied it. So, from the good common people went up a protest against class legislation, and many a vote in the balance went the wrong way.

I noted in the newspapers that even beautiful, cultured Edinburgh went down completely without the dries winning in a single ward. Here again some infighting must be learned so that the sections where there is dry voting can be separated from the tie-up with too large a wet section. There must be good fighting between elections or the liquor men will continue to make up wards for voting areas to suit themselves. There were many wards won by the dries throughout Scotland, and because there were not as many as desired, the dry sentiment must recognize the tremendous value of these dry wards. They are just so much dry powder for the next election. From them can be gathered, after a year, some very weighty and far-reaching facts. Every dry ward is an incubator hatching out splendid facts for the future fuss. Comparison of these dry wards with adjoining wet wards will open the eyes of half-hearted voters; and, for reasons other than moral ones, public sentiment will be aroused and turned to vote in the right direction.

I REMEMBER my own education some years ago concerning this point. I went into a little dry city to lecture on a state issue. I delivered the best temperance address of which I was capable. The editor of the city daily paper met me at the close, and invited me to come to his office the following morning. Thinking he would probably want an interview for his paper, and hoping to see my name and fame blaze forth in print, I got me to his den at the appointed hour. It was for an awful calling down. Didn't I know that I was behind the times? Didn't

I know that the great majorities do not move on moral sentiment? Didn't I know that only the few cared for an ideal and that later some issue of necessity or need gave draught to the fire and brought the reformation? Didn't I know that slavery went on and on, fought against by the few, until the great issue of state's rights had its toes stepped on and the fight was on in earnest and slavery burned up in the fire of a Civil war? "Look here, lad," he urged, "change your tactics."

I could see only the pair of blinded eyes of this fighting editor. He could not see daylight, but he had been brought to see some things about the liquor question. He went on telling me how he had fought everything that lifted its head and dared to talk prohibition. He had done this, he said, in all his editorial experience until two years earlier. The dries had carried the town two years before, he informed me, and he came down into the middle of the street the following morning, threw his hat down on the ground, and cursed aloud everyone who had helped to make his home town dry. Then he went upstairs to his editorial typewriter, dipped his ribbon in vitriol, and for weeks hammered out great "cussings" against his fellow townsmen who had dared to "dustify" instead of "mudify" his little city.

Well, the one brightest man he had was "Bill." A writer and typesetter and an all-around man was this brilliant Bill; but he was also a drunkard. Regularly on Monday mornings the editor called at Bill's home to see that the wife and children had something to eat and to make sure Bill was sleeping off his drunk and would be at work by Tuesday. He not only gave Bill his wages, but found himself forced to pay the large end of Bill's accounts at the stores, if he wanted to keep Bill at his place. Others in the shop, though not nearly as bad, had Bill's habits, and money for their children's needs went over the bar.

A few dry weeks went by. "Who's this with the new suit?" That's Bill. "Family is fine, thank you." That's Bill's answer Monday mornings now, as he comes to work. "Bill was my first eye-opener," confessed the editor. Increase in advertisements was the next. He asked his advertisers why they bought more space. They told him the people were buying more stuff and were paying for it in cash. They were all bidding for the trade. All the police but one were fired. Reason—no work to do. One big fat man, occupying the box on a downtown corner, was the lone officer on duty. Only the college boys in their pranks caused any wear to his shoe-leather.

I saw what had changed the editor from a wet to a dry, copied the facts and secured affidavits, procured short letters from the business men and bankers, and printed the facts about one dry town, and scattered the information. I think the heading of the bulletin was, "A Blind Editor Sees a City without a Jail."

The facts fanned the moral flame and turned the temperance talks into votes, changing our temperance touring car into a truck delivering a full load of victory votes.

PAUL RADER—he prefers to write his name without prefixes or suffixes—the successor to Moody, Torrey and Dixon in the famous Moody Church Tabernacle in Chicago, now is engaging in a round-the-world evangelistic tour. He conducted successful missions in several cities of the British Isles and now is in the Orient. Just before the beginning of the New Year, a characteristic cable message was received from him: "Praising God with the saints in Jerusalem. All well, Rader." From Palestine, Mr. Rader will go to India, China, Japan, the Philippines, and then return home.

IN EUROPE they must learn to "Get the areas!" "Get the facts!" "Spread the facts!" Yes, facts from dry areas win.

Over there the liquor business is in concrete trenches. With us in America a liquor man never stood high, but in England "the trade," as they say, walks the aisles of many churches and is present in person in Parliament. It will take high explosives to unseat his royal cornship, but the facts gathered from dry areas and dry America and dropped like bombs over Europe will do the work.

The night I landed in Liverpool I spoke at the Gay Street mission, and in the short distance from hotel to Gay Street, from my taxi I counted twelve drunken women. My first sight in Glasgow, on my way to the Tabernacle, shocked me more than anything I ever saw in America—and I was born in Denver and raised in touch with the rough open towns of the West. Whiskey-soaked slum folks were thick on the streets. Fallen at the foot of a stairway was a drunken woman, another falling over her in the effort to lift her up. Unspeakable are the slums of Europe without whiskey, but with whiskey they are the last word in wretchedness.

The good men and women of Europe are awake. They will learn to fight with figures and facts, with the record of dollars saved by dry areas. This record of economic facts is a new smelling-salts that opens the heads of the money-loving men of our day. The wet and dry fight is on moral and political ground now, but once the dries get their facts they will find that the pocketbook has finer feelings than the heart in this case with the great voting majority.

Economic competition has had its great changes and the nations are off for a new contest in manufacturing after the war's reverses. No nation with whiskey or beer and wine-soaked workers is going to win. Liquor does not make contented workers any more than morphine cures disease. The workingmen in America will soon produce some great new facts in economic contentment. They will prove that the absence of the beer-can from the home means the absence of tear-stains from the faces of wife and children. Europe will see these facts and force those in authority to action.

LIQUOR is flowing all around me. I have been to France and Italy, and am now in Switzerland, as I write this. Europe is wilder today for drink than ever. She is trying everywhere to wash down the taste of war from her mouth. She will find her "morning after," and in its "cold, gray dawn" she will philosophize. She will look at her pink-cheeked laughing neighbor across the Atlantic, dry and forging ahead. She will shake away the chill, and by some movement, cry, "Never again."

You will ask me, and rightly so, "What is that movement to be?" I have answered that it will come from a bombing with facts. But there is one big "if," and I am talking of purely natural forces. That "if" is the necessity of conscience to handle facts. I find a horribly dull conscience here. Now, something must awaken Europe's conscience. These things are awfully wrong and are leading to the most far-reaching immoral conditions. What will produce a new conscience in Europe? We hoped the war would quicken the conscience of the world, but it did not; it has greatly seared it.

I know of only one real sure remedy, and that is a great God-sent revival following old-time Gospel lines. An old-time revival will make a new conscience. Will they have one? I believe they will. It is in the air in Scotland and in England, and even in Ireland, a great hunger, in spite of their troubles, is felt. Revivals made the fire behind the facts in America. Town after town, section after section went dry after a real revival.

Europe will never go dry until she has had a great revival. I felt the revival fires warming up as I visited Glasgow and Edinburgh. I wish I might have stayed to see it break into flame, for surely it must soon do so. God has His man and men here somewhere, and they will soon send forth the cry. God will not leave His people without a prophet. He has a mighty people over here who know the real fundamentals of the Gospel and know the place of prayer. The quickest way—and I think the only way—to a dry victory is by God's people praying for a revival.

False Guides

IN THESE troubled days, with their increase of strange and misleading doctrines, we have a foreshadowing of the spiritually perilous times in which false Christs and false prophets should arise, showing great signs and wonders, so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect. "Then, if any man say unto you, Lo, here is the Christ, believe it not. . . . If they shall say: Behold, he is in the wilderness, go not forth; or, behold he is in the inner chambers, believe it not." Such was the warning which Jesus Himself gave to His followers, and which has been handed down to us in the Gospels.

False guides are taking the opportunity, when the world is undergoing great changes, to sow the seeds of unbelief. They are sedulously striving to mislead the people. It is a time for all true believers in Christ and His teachings, to take heed lest they be led astray by sensational propagators of dangerous doctrines. It was undoubtedly this class of alarmists, whose false and presumptuous interpretations of Scripture are designed to deceive, that He had in view when He assured His followers that such men were not real prophets, but impostors, and that "no one, not even the angels," knows the Divine will nor the time appointed. And Jesus, for the further reassurance of believers, told them that the attitude of the true Christian at such a time of disquietude should be that of prayerful preparation, each doing his duty and with a serene trust in God, Who has all who are faithful in His keeping.

Plotting Against Prohibition

IT NEEDS no prophet to foretell that if Prohibition should fail, the cause of its failure will be found to rest with those who are paid to serve the Government in its enforcement. For some time past it has been evident that there was a leak somewhere, and now comes the news that a nation-wide whisky ring, said to be backed by prominent persons, including federal officials, with headquarters in New York, Chicago and Jersey City, is doing its best to render Prohibition ineffective. Among other paraphernalia it has been found that rubber stamps, bearing the signatures of federal enforcement officials for Illinois and New Jersey, have been extensively used. Through forged permits thousands of gallons of liquor have been withdrawn from warehouses in New York, Pennsylvania and Kentucky. One of the persons involved, who is under arrest, has made confession and, with another under similar charges, has been held for trial, failing to furnish $10,000 bail.

All the evidence in this matter goes to show that in the appointing of Prohibition enforcement officers, somebody has been woefully if not criminally lax. No doubt the majority of our revenue agents are men of character, sober, honest and reliable in the performance of their duty; but there are others who should never have been appointed, and who it is alleged make common cause with crooks and criminals, gangsters and the like to defeat the very laws they are paid to enforce. The temptation of "easy money" is too great and the weakness for liquor too strong for such men to resist.

In a number of cases of recent occurrence, prohibition agents, according to the newspaper accounts, were hobnobbing with those engaged in setting the law at defiance. Investigation is said to have revealed the fact that there was a Prohibition agent involved in the drunken brawl that led to the killing in New York of "Monk" Eastman, the notorious gangster. In several other cases, U. S. officials are reported as being involved in violations, and in collusion with the actual culprits and a party to their plots.

Such a condition of affairs should not be tolerated. It takes time to wake up the American people. They are long-suffering and patient. They have a right to demand that the Government should take steps to forestall the purpose of the lawbreakers who, hand in hand with paid officers of the Government, are making Prohibition enforcement a farce. There should be a thorough overhauling of the lists of appointees, and every man who has shown the slightest disposition to further the plans of law-breakers should be summarily removed. Prohibition must have a clear field for enforcement. Wherever it has been enforced it has produced excellent results. Right-thinking citizens are beginning to be aroused over the amazing latitude that is still allowed to the sale of drink, especially in our big cities. They have a right to look to the federal authorities for such a drastic revision of their appointments as will remove all who join with gangsters and criminals to defeat the law.

Revising History

THREE hundred and fifty years ago, just after the return of Charles II to the throne of Great Britain, a mob of Royalists who had hated and misunderstood Cromwell, the great Commoner, dug his body out of the grave, dragged it through the London streets to Tyburn and hanged it in the gibbet there, and afterwards cut off the head. They also went to Westminster Abbey and demanded from the priests the bodies of Cromwell's wife and daughter and dragged them through the streets and threw them into a common pit.

But as you go into the House of Commons now, the first thing you notice as you enter is the noble statue of Cromwell, inside the enclosure of the Houses of Parliament, the only monument of any kind that has ever been allowed a place there.

About sixty years ago, in the British Museum, there was a large cartoon in Punch showing Abraham Lincoln sitting on a heap of skulls of American soldiers, and laughing over a funny story he was telling to his cabinet.

But a few months ago, in the midst of a pouring rain, in the heart of London, a great crowd stood with bared heads when a noble statue of Lincoln was unveiled, and the English people honored him as the First American.

In H. G. Wells's "Outline of History" we find that from the most recent historical records we must paint new pictures of the famous ones of the past. He says of Napoleon that he was "A scoundrel, bright and complete, without a conscience, or any moral standard." Of Caesar and Alexander and Frederick the Great he speaks with frank criticism of their immoral and selfish lives, in a way that very few historians have dared to speak. And the result is that we are obliged to revise our definitions of very many public characters, and write new chapters in what have been praise of heroes and great ones of the earth.

This is the serious defect of the present day journalism in that it is unable, in the very nature of the case, to measure soberly the doings of men. We are not getting the real facts about the Japanese situation on the Pacific Coast. We are not being informed truly about a great multitude of human affairs, because the newspaper correspondents are not able, even when they want to be, to weigh and sift the evidence and account for the motives and actions of those whose words and acts are caught "on the fly" and at once put on the printed page and called "history."

We may as well make up our minds that a good part of what we call news is not news at all, in the sense of being accurate history. It takes at least one hundred years to get a true look at a great man. It was three hundred and fifty from Tyburn to the House of Commons.

Which would ensure the happier future for the United States:

*An investment of $100,000,000 in more warships?
An investment of $100,000,000 in the lives of 15,000,000 of the best type of Chinese who will die without our help?*

Some Railroad Facts

DID you know that the mileage of the railroads in the United States in 1919 was 233,441 miles of operated roads? Almost enough to go around the equator ten times?

Did you know that in 1919 there were employed on these miles of railroads 1,953,571 persons, men and women, running the trains, working in the shops, office buildings and in the various places where railroad people work?

Did you know that the cost of operating all the railroads in the United States in 1919 was $4,419,989,000?

Did you know that the valuation of all the railroads in the United States, based on the 1920 rate cases is $18,900,000,000?

Did you know that 1,084,960,449 people travel on the railroads in a year's time?

Did you know receipts from a year's travel (in 1919) amounted to $1,178,120,000?

Did you know that the total receipts for passenger, and freight service, including Pullman receipts, mail, express, and all operating revenues in a year's time is $5,184,230,000?

These are large figures, but railroads are large things. How large they are, and how important to what we call our civilization very few people in this country stop to think. If the roads were suddenly to stop operating altogether, as our social system is now organized, it would mean ruin and death. Cities could no longer receive food supplies or fuel supplies. Babies would die for lack of milk. Pestilence would spring up in a fearful toll of life. Workers in cities and towns could not reach their places of daily labor. Merchandise would no longer move from factory to store. And all our social order would become disorganized.

The railroad is in the highest sense, a moral factor in a community, if it is rightly understood. It may and should serve the highest ends of public safety and happiness. It is a constant source of confidence in the best elements of human nature to reflect that out of nearly 2,000,000 people engaged in helping to make railroads keep going, an exceedingly small number ever fail of duty to the public so far as its safety is concerned. When we consider that more than one billion persons travel on the United States railroads in a year, and that out of that number only 5,000 are killed or injured in the same time, most of them from their own carelessness, one understands something of the care and fidelity on the part of the railroad employees exercised day and night on the track, in the engines, over the bridges, through the mountains and tunnels and over the desert in order that the traveler may reach his destination safely. It is in order that the American people consider the best ways of using this great public servant which has grown to be such a giant of necessary social need. The highest and most skilled mental and moral forces will be needed in the next quarter of a century to maintain and develop this mighty system of transportation as it ought to be managed for the good of all the people.

Great Britain wants to call a halt to naval construction, but can not take this step unless the United States agrees to stop building warships. Congress might speed up disarmament by appropriating some of the money intended for navy yards to Chinese relief.

This Slow Old World

THE earth on which we live is a fast earth and is traveling at a rate of something over 60 miles a second. But the moral and ethical world in which we live is a slow old world, and some people say it is not making any time at all out of darkness into light.

It would seem to be taken for granted by every one in this old world, after centuries of trouble and sorrow and loss caused by war and drink and lust and greed and race feeling, that by common consent the whole world would meet in a common Convention and in about five minutes unanimously vote these things out of existence and start the millennium going at once.

That is what some of us think we would do if we had the power to do it for the old world.

But as a matter of fact, that is not the way the old world has done it so far. What painful years of untold agony before human slavery was voted out of existence! What brave lives wiped out, what oceans of blood shed, what millions of property destroyed before a thing that you would think every one would agree to wipe out in five minutes could be taken out of civilization. Not five minutes to destroy a wrong, but centuries of painful crucifixion and agony.

What long years it took to educate the mind and instruct the people about a wrong to the physical, spiritual, and political and business life of the world, like the liquor evil! What millions bruised on the wheel of its cruelty before we could be persuaded to put an end to a thing that you would think mankind by unanimous consent centuries ago would have agreed to abolish in five minutes!

And how long it takes this slow, old world to create a frame of mind that will put an end forever to war! One would think that this evil of all evils would not have to wait before it was told to clear out of civilization. But what centuries of broken hearts, what blood-stained pages of history, until a great part of a nation's story is the story of its battles! What agony of mind and body! What horrors of suffering on the part of the suffering masses!

Paul Hymans of Belgium, permanent president of the Assembly, said in his reply to the welcome of the President of Switzerland:

"We are far from believing that we are going to change the world with a wave of a wand, for the world changes slowly, and most slowly men change."

Surely it is a slow, old world! It is a good thing for us poor humans that our God is so patient. If He were not, long before this He would surely have taken this slow, old world of ours in His hand of wrath and thrown it back into the chaos from which He once took it.

The World News of the Week

Huge Withdrawals of Intoxicants on Forged Orders Revealed

THE enormous scale on which the illicit traffic in intoxicants has been conducted was revealed through the discovery by agents of the Special Intelligence Unit of the Internal Revenue Bureau of more than 1,000 forged permits upon which millions of gallons of whiskey had been illegally withdrawn from distilleries and bonded warehouses for sale in New York City. The amounts of liquor called for by these forged permits ranged from one barrel to ten thousand cases and their total retail value was estimated at upwards of $100,000,000.

The disclosures were made as the result of the work of a corps of investigators who were sent from Washington to inquire into prohibition enforcement situation in New York, and the forgeries covered a period of four or five months. In many cases the names of reputable firms were used and the federal agents, after thorough inquiry, were convinced the names of the firms were used without their knowledge or consent.

Several arrests already have been made, and among the accused are employees of the prohibition enforcement officers who were in positions to facilitate the traffic in forged permits. The temptation to which the enforcement officers were subjected was indicated by the disclosure that one agent was offered $5,000 if he would obtain a basic withdrawal permit, and later was promised an additional $100,000 if he would enter a conspiracy for the issuance of other withdrawal permits. With the profits of the rum-runners soaring up in the aggregate to tens of millions of dollars, they were able to offer large bribes, and some of the federal employees succumbed.

Charles R. O'Connor, who recently took office as Federal Prohibition Director for New York state, temporarily discontinued the issuance of withdrawal permits and announced his intention to reduce the number of basic permit holders by 50 per cent. in an effort to stop the frauds. Many aliens have held such permits, although a state law forbids their participation in liquor traffic, and with a closer investigation of permits they will be excluded.

The persistency with which the liquor interests continue their operations was indicated by the issuance by Federal Judge Landis in Chicago of temporary injunctions restraining four breweries from violating the prohibitory laws after the submission of evidence to prove they had been brewing real beer. Illinois State officials planned to ask for injunctions against twenty other breweries.

Naval Aeronauts Safe in Wilds

IT OFTEN seems that the age of adventure is past, but three American navy lieutenants who left an air station in the outskirts of New York City in the balloon A-5598 and landed next day in the frozen wilderness on the shores of Hudson Bay went through adventures for which it would be difficult to find a parallel in the pages of fiction. For nearly three weeks no word was received from the aeronauts and, except by their families, hope for them had been almost abandoned when an Indian runner, after a 200-mile trip through the snow, brought word that they were safe at Moose Factory, Ontario.

While over the Adirondack Mountains in northern New York, the balloon was caught by a terrific gale which swept it northward, sometimes at a speed of seventy miles an hour. After drifting for many hours, the aeronauts heard a dog's howling and decided to land. They struck in dense forest and were almost stripped of clothing in descending, their balloon being wrecked. In a temperature ten degrees below zero, but unusually mild for that region, they wandered for four days through the deep snow of the wilderness, almost without food, before they found an Indian trapper, who at first fled from them in fright. He guided them to a post of the Hudson's Bay Company, where they were fed and clothed and sheltered, and then set out to carry the news of their rescue to the nearest railway.

An enthusiastic welcome was ready for the aeronauts—Lieutenants Walter Hinton, a veteran of the transatlantic flight in the NC-4, L. A. Kloor and Stephen A. Farrell—when they reached the first town on their homeward journey.

General Crowder Sent to Cuba

WITH Cuba still suffering from a financial crisis and with the succession to the Presidency in doubt two months after the general elections, President Wilson has sent Major General Enoch Crowder to the island to confer with President Menocal in an effort to straighten out the difficulties. General Crowder drafted the regulation under which the elections were held, and is one of the best informed men in the United States regarding Cuban affairs. The Washington government twice has intervened in Cuba under the treaty provision which authorizes such action in Cuban interests, and intervention is possible again if General Crowder considers it adthe national finances. Taken in connection with the election tangle, the situation has aroused fears that a revolution may be started.

On the face of the election returns, Dr. Alfredo Zayas, the coalition candidate, was elected to succeed President Menocal, whose term expires on May 20, but enough votes were missing to make possible a victory for José Miguel Gomez, the Liberal candidate.

Charges of fraud have been insistently presented, but the Cuban courts have been slow to act, although some ballots have been thrown out as fraudulent. Several by-elections have been called and these may determine the final result. General Crowder's visit, it was hoped, would induce the Cuban government to expedite a settlement.

War Finance Board Revived

CONGRESS has overridden President Wilson's veto of the joint resolution reviving the War Finance Corporation in order to assist the exportation of farm products, the vote in the Senate being 53 to 5 and in the House 250 to 66. But the measure seems likely to be of no more value to the farmers than was the action of the House in rushing through a bill to levy protective customs duties on agricultural products and which will be delayed indefinitely in the Senate by the decision to hold committee hearings on it. To enable the War Finance Corporation to accomplish anything, Congress must pass other legislation providing funds for it—probably $1,000,000,000 would be needed—and with the Treasury facing a deficit of $1,500,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year, it would be difficult to find the money.

The President, in his veto message, declared that if the Corporation's activities assumed large proportions it would mean more taxes or additional borrowing, and in either case would impose new burdens on all the people. He pointed out that exports have increased steadily since the Armistice, and declared the difficulty in the way of still larger exports "does not seem to lie so much in the lack of financial ability here as Europe's lack of means to make payment." He added a belief that even if it were possible to make advances to producers, they could not accomplish the objects in view by creating a demand for American products.

The House overrode the veto without debate, and only two short speeches were made in the Senate. It was predicted further efforts to revitalize the War Finance Corporation would be defeated; but the advocates of the tariff measure became more hopeful after Senator Penrose, who at first opposed it, announced he would support it in the Senate.

Secondary Boycott Forbidden

THE United States Supreme Court, in a far-reaching decision affecting the rights of labor organizations to employ the secondary boycott against employers, decided that labor unions are not immune from prosecution and judicial restraint if they interfere with the interstate trade of employers. Six justices concurred, and three dissented regarding the opinion, which overturned the decisions of two lower courts.

The case arose through an action of the Duplex Printing Press Company of Battle Creek, Mich., against the International Association of Machinists. In substance the Supreme Court held that the action of the Association in calling a strike because the company refused to recognize the closed shop, and in refusing to permit the setting up of its presses, was a conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce in violation of the anti-trust laws. The union contended that the Clayton law relieved labor organizations of liability under the Sherman Act provisions forbidding combinations in restraint of trade.

The three dissenting justices declared the decision rendered futile an effort of more than twenty years to place employers and employees on an equal basis before the law, and held that the union's action was clearly a case of self defense.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, assailed the decision as a "blow at the movement for human freedom and progress" and asserted the Supreme Court had "joined forces with the anti-union shop movement."

Inaugural Plans Cause Clashes

CHAPTER XII

A Fascinating Serial

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AND then the climax of Ella's life—the crash that Rose-Marie had been expecting—happened. It happened when Ella came furiously into the Volsky flat, early one afternoon, and—ignoring the little Lily, who sat placidly on Rose-Marie's lap—hurried silently into her own room. Mrs. Volsky, bending over the washtubs, straightened up as if she could almost feel the electric quality of the air as Ella passed her, but Rose-Marie only held tighter to Lily as if, somehow, the slim little body gave her comfort.

"I wonder what's happened," she ventured, after a moment.

Mrs. Volsky, again bending over the washtubs, answered.

"Ella, she act so funny, lately," she told Rose-Marie, "an' there is some feller: Bennie, he tell me that he have seen her wit' some feller! A rich feller, maybe; maybe he puts Ella up to her funny business!"

There were sounds of activity from the inner room, as if clothing was being torn down from hooks, as if heavy garments were being flung into bags. Rose-Marie listened, apprehensively, to the sounds before she spoke again.

"Perhaps I'd better go in and see what's the matter," she suggested.

Mrs. Volsky, looking back over her shoulder, gave a helpless little shrug. "If you t'inks best," she said hopelessly. "But Ella—she not never want to take any help. . . ."

Only too well Rose-Marie knew what Mrs. Volsky meant by her twisted sentence. Only too well she understood that Ella would never allow herself to be biased by another's judgment, that Ella would not allow herself to be moved by another's plea. And yet she set Lily gently down upon the floor and rose to her feet.

"I'll see what she's doing," she told Mrs. Volsky, and pushed open the inner door.

DESPITE all of the time that she had spent in the Volsky flat, Rose-Marie had never been past the front room with its tumbled heaps of bedding, and its dirt. She was surprised to see that the inner room, shared by Ella and Lily, was exquisitely neat, though tiny. There were no windows—the only light came from a rusty gas fixture—but Rose-Marie, after months in the slums, was prepared for that. It was the geranium, blooming on the shabby table, that caught her eyes; it was the clean hair brush, lying on the same table, and the framed picture of a Madonna, upon the wall, that attracted her. She spoke of them, first, to the girl who knelt on the floor, packing a cheap suitcase—spoke of them before she questioned gently:

"You're not going away, are you, Ella?"

Ella glanced up from her packing.

"Yes, I'm going away!" she said, shortly. And then, as if against her will, she added:

"I got th' flower an' th' picture for Lily. Oh, sure, I know that she can't see 'em! But I sorter feel that she knows they're here!"

Rose-Marie's voice was very soft, as she spoke again. "I'm glad that you chose the picture you did," she said, "the picture of the Christ Child and His Mother!"

Ella wadded a heavy dress into the suitcase.

"I don't hold much with religious pictures," she said, without looking up. "Religion never did much fer me! I only got it 'cause th' Baby had hair like Lily's hair!"

Rose-Marie crouched down, suddenly, upon the floor beside the girl. She laid her hand upon the suitcase.

"Where are you going, Ella!" she asked abruptly. "Where are you going—and when will you be back?"

Ella's lips drew up into the semblance of a smile, a very bitter one, as she answered.

"It's none of yer business, where I'm goin'," she said, "an' I may not ever come back—see!"

Rose-Marie caught her breath in a kind of sob. It was as she had guessed—and feared!

"Ella," she asked slowly, "are you going alone?"

THE girl's face colored swiftly, with a glorious wave of crimson. She tossed her head with a defiant movement.

"No, I ain't goin' alone!" she told Rose-Marie. "You kin betcha life I ain't goin' alone!"

Rose-Marie—sitting beside her on the floor—asked God, silently, for help before she spoke again. She felt suddenly powerless, futile.

"Why are you going, dear?" she questioned, at last.

Ella dropped the shoes that she had been about to tuck into the suitcase. Her eyes were grim.

"Because," she said, "I'm tired of all o' this," her finger pointed in the direction of the outer room. "I'm tired o' dirt, and drunken people, and Jim's rotten talk. I'm tired o' meals et out o' greasy dishes, an' cheap clothes, and jobs that I hate—an' that I can't nohow seem ter hold! I'm tired, dog tired, o' life. All that's ever held me in this place is Lily. An' sometimes, when I look at her, I don't think that she'd know the difference whether I was here 'r not!"

Rose-Marie was half sobbing in her earnestness.

"Oh, but she would know the difference," she cried. "Lily loves you with all of her heart. And your mother is really trying to be neater, to make a better home for you! She hasn't a pleasant time of it, either—your mother. But she doesn't run away. She stays!"

There was scorn in the laugh that came, all at once, from Ella's twisted mouth. Her great eyes were somberly sarcastic.

"Sure, she stays," said Ella, "cause she ain't got enough gumption ter be gettin' out! I know."

IN HER heart Rose-Marie was inclined to agree with Ella. She knew, herself, that Mrs. Volsky would never have the courage to make any sort of a definite decision. But she couldn't say so—not while Ella was staring at her with that somberly sarcastic expression.

"I guess," she said bravely, "that we'd better leave your mother out of this discussion. After all, it's between you—and your conscience."

"Say," Ella's face was suddenly drawn and ugly, "say, where do you get off to pull this conscience stuff? You've always had a nice home, an' pretty clothes, an' clean vittles, an'—an' love! I ain't had any of it. But," her eyes flamed, "I'm goin' to! Don't you dast ter pull this conscience stuff on me—I've heard you profess'nal slummers talk before—a lot o' times. What good has a conscience ever done me—huh?"

Rose-Marie had been watching the girl's face. Of a sudden she shot her thunderbolt.

"Are you running away to be married, Ella?" she asked.

A second flush ran over Ella's face, and receded slowly, leaving it very pale. But her head went up rather gallantly.

"No, I ain't," she retorted. "Marriage," she said the words parrot-like, "was made fer th' sort o' folks who can't stick at nothin' unless they're tied. I ain't one of those folks!"

Across the nearly forgotten suitcase, Rose-Marie leaned toward Ella Volsky. Her eyes were suddenly hot with anger.

"Who gave you that sort of an argument?" she demanded. "Who has been filling your head with lies? You never thought of that yourself, Ella—I know you never thought of that yourself!"

Ella's eyes were blazing—Rose-Marie almost thought that the girl was going to strike her! But the blazing eyes wavered, after a moment, and fell.

"My gentleman fren' says marriage is wrong," said Ella. "He knows a lot. And he has so much money—" she made a wide gesture with her hands—"I can have a nice place ter live, Miss Rose-Marie, an' pretty clothes. Lookit ma; she's married an'

she ain't got nothin'! I can have coats an' hats an'—"

ROSE-MARIE touched Ella's hand, timidly, with her cool fingers.

"But you'll have to pay for them, Ella," she said. "Think, dear, will the coats and hats be worth the price that you'll have to pay? Will they be worth the price of self-respect—will they be worth the price of honorable widowhood and—motherhood? Will the pretty clothes, Ella, make it easier for you to look into the face of some other woman—who has kept straight? Will they?"

Ella raised her eyes and, in their suddenly vague expression, Rose-Marie saw a glimmering of the faded, crushed mother. She hurried on.

"What kind of a chap is this gentleman friend?" she raged, "to ask so much of you, dear? Is there—is there any reason why he can't marry you? Is he tied to some one else?"

All at once Ella was sobbing, with gusty, defiant sobs.

"Not as far as I've heard of, there ain't nobody else," she sobbed. "I don't know much about him, Miss Rose-Marie. Jim gimme a knockdown ter him, one night in a dance hall. I thought he was all right—Jim said he was. . . . An' he said he loved me, an'—wildly, "I love him, too! An' I hate it all, here, except Lily—"

Rose-Marie, thinking rapidly, seized her advantage.

"Will going away with him," she asked steadily, "be worth never seeing Lily again? For you wouldn't be able to see her again—you wouldn't be able to touch her, you know, if your hands weren't—clean. You bought her a religious picture, Ella, and a flower. Why? Because you know, in your heart, that she's aware of religion and beauty and sweetness! Going away with this man, Ella, will separate you from Lily, just as completely as an ocean flowing between the two of you would make a separation! And all of your life you'll have to know that she's suffering somewhere, perhaps, that maybe somebody's hurting her—that her dresses are dirty and her hair isn't combed! Every time you hear a little child crying you'll think of Lily—who can't cry aloud. Every time a pair of blue eyes look into your face you'll think of her eyes—that can't see. Will going away with him be worth never knowing Ella, whether she's alive or dead—"

ELLA had stopped sobbing, but the acute misery of her face was somehow more pitiful than tears. Rose-Marie waited, for a moment, and then—as Ella did not speak—she got up from her place beside the suitcase, and going to the dividing door, opened it softly.

The room was as she had left it. Mrs. Volsky was still bending above the tubs, Lily was standing in almost the same place that Rose-Marie had left her. With hurried steps Rose-Marie crossed the room; took the child's slim, little hand in her own.

"Come with me, honey," she said, almost forgetting that Lily could not hear her voice. "Come with me—" and she led her gently back to the inner room.

Ella was sitting on the floor, her face still wan, her attitude unconsciously tragic. But as the child, clinging to Rose-Marie's hand, came over to her side, she was suddenly galvanized into action.

"Oh, darlin', darlin'—" she sobbed wildly, "Ella was a-goin' ter leave you! Ella was a-goin' away. But she isn't now—not now! Darlin', her arms were flung wildly about the little figure, "show some way that you forgive Ella—who loves you!"

Rose-Marie was crying, quite frankly. All at once she dropped down on the floor and put her arms about the two sisters—the big one and the little one—and her sobs mingled with the sobs of Ella. But, curiously enough, as she stood like a little statue between them, a sudden smile swept across the face of Lily. She might, almost, have understood.

CHAPTER XIII

THEY went together for a long time, Ella and Rose-Marie. And as they cried something grew out of their common emotion. It was a something that they both felt, subconsciously—a something warm and friendly. It might have been a new bond of affection, a new chain of love. Rose-Marie, as she felt it, was able to say to herself, with more of tolerance than she had ever known:

"If I had been as tempted and as unhappy as she—well, I might, perhaps, have reacted in the same way!"

And Ella, sobbing in the arms of the girl that she had never quite understood, was able to tell herself: "She's right—dead right! The straight road's the only road. . . ."

What Has Gone Before

ROSE-MARIE, who has come from her sheltered, quiet home in the country to the Settlement House in the city's slums, clashes with the Young Doctor, an orphan, who has had to fight for opportunity all his life. She is imbued with a passion to make people better, while he avows as his only purpose a desire to make them healthier without regard to their souls. In a tiny park Rose-Marie later interrupts a small boy in his torturing of a kitten, rescues the animal, and wins the friendship of the lad by discovering the one tender spot of his heart—love of his younger sister Lily. She visits Bennie Volsky's home, without telling her associates at the Settlement House, and finds it more dirty and squalid than she had dreamed any home could be—the father in a drunken stupor; the mother dull and hopeless; Ella, the elder daughter, beautiful but hard; Jim, the elder son, with a nameless menace in his eyes. Lily, the only means through which Rose-Marie can arouse the family to better things, is blind, and deaf, and can not speak. Rose-Marie's absences when she is calling on the Volsky family are noticed by the Young Doctor, who jestingly accuses her of having a beau. But the girl is able to arouse in Mrs. Volsky a desire for improvement. Bennie visits the Settlement House and his talk with the Young Doctor shows Rose-Marie's friendship has developed new ideals in him. He refuses, however, to disclose the name of the person who induced him to come.

In extending its activities the Mission is reaching out after these boys and girls of the East Side who find the crowded street their only play ground. Afternoons are now set aside for them at the Mission and they are entertained with games, stories and motion pictures.

A NEW ILLUSTRATED RED LETTER BIBLE

WITH 48 BEAUTIFUL PHOTOGRAVURE PICTURES

From the Famous Mastroianni Sculptural Reliefs

IN THIS age of mighty events, that have shaken the world to its foundations, the Bible should be in every home in our beloved land. These are "times of fulfilment" and we need God's Word more than ever. Upon those who honor Him and study His message, He bestows spiritual understanding and great blessing. The Christian Herald, which in the last forty years has manufactured and put in circulation more Bibles than all other religious publications in America, outside of the Bible Societies, has scored its greatest triumph in the production of the new Photogravure Red Letter Bible.

Domenico Mastroianni has been called the Tisot of Sculpture. He has spent the greater part of his life time in the Orient, and especially in Palestine. He studied people, customs, dress, until he became able to express in his art the unchanging spirit of the Holy Land and its people. All of his work is instinct with life; every figure seems to move and breathe; his landscapes, lakes and rivers have an atmosphere that heightens the charm of his wondrous art. His genius has given us a new revelation in the sublimest of all pictorial themes—Bible Illustration. Every one of the 48 sculptures is an artistic triumph.

"The Bible Beautiful" is presented in a setting worthy of the priceless volume. It is the ideal Bible for the Home, being printed in clear, legible type that is easily read without straining the eyes. It is equipped with the latest aids and helps, and in addition has 16 maps of Bible Lands, in colors. A great charm, however, is added to the Book by the 48 splendid, full-page photogravure reproductions of the world famous sculptural masterpieces by Domenico Mastroianni.

Co-operating to Save Starving China

THE readers of the Christian Herald are now a strong co-operating factor in the great nationwide effort to save 15,000,000 lives in China.

Soon after the Christian Herald announced that it would open a China Famine Fund it became apparent that every resource of the United States would be required if our work was to seriously count against the tremendous need in the famine district. We welcomed heartily, therefore, the action of President Wilson in naming an American Committee for China Famine Fund.

It will interest all our friends to learn that the national organization has been assembled in the offices of the Christian Herald in space put at the disposal of the committee by Mr. Patterson, the publisher. The thorough co-operation between the Christian Herald and the American Committee is evidenced by the following letter:

January 4, 1921.

"Mr. Thomas W. Lamont,
Chairman,

American Committee for China Famine Fund, New York City.

"My dear Mr. Lamont:

"Allow me to congratulate the American Committee for China Famine Fund on the progress it is making in its great work for the relief of China. Thus far the Christian Herald has sent three remittances, which are being applied in practical relief through the hands of a small committee of missionaries in the field.

"Now that our national Committee is fully prepared to assume the task of conducting the relief work on a much larger scale, I think the opportunity has arrived to make a beginning of practical work possible. With this end in view, I take pleasure in enclosing this check representing contributions from Christian Herald readers. Further remittances will follow weekly.

"We fully appreciate all the kind things that have been said in relation to the Christian Herald and its work, not only by the members of your Committee, but by allied organizations, and I look forward with a good deal of satisfaction to the more extended work which your Committee will now undertake and in which you may depend upon our heartiest co-operation.

"Very cordially yours,
(signed) GRAHAM PATTERSON."
President of the Christian Herald.

THROUGH the efforts of the two great volunteer organizations at work in America and China, nothing is being left undone for the relief of the many millions suffering untold misery from the famine which holds in its grip the five northern provinces of China. American contributions raised by the Christian Herald and the American Committee for China Famine Fund are immediately transmitted by cable.

The American Committee, through its Executive Committee, is organizing units in each state, and having state banks designated as local depositories for funds raised within each state. Contributions received are regularly forwarded to the national headquarters in New York. In this way the work is co-ordinated, and American dollars received and sent to China from one central point at the utmost saving of time.

Similarly, in China, the various relief agencies are operating through the central organization in Peking, the International Famine Relief Committee. Just as soon as the famine began to make itself felt, a number of committees were formed to bring immediate help to the stricken people, including the American Red Cross and a body of missionaries working in behalf of the Christian Herald. It was found that with several organizations in the field duplication of effort might result and the buying of food by a number of agencies would undoubtedly cause prices to rise. Accordingly, the International Famine Relief Committee was formed to act as the central clearing house of the various organizations at work to provide relief measures for the famine sufferers, including the Christian Herald workers and the Red Cross. The members of the International Committee are American and European business men with interests in China, missionaries and officials of the Chinese Government. The activity of this committee is indicated by the report just received that relief units have been established at Tsinan-fu, Honan, Hankow and Tien Tsin.

According to reliable information from business men and missionaries who have been through the stricken regions, the area in which famine conditions actually exist now is 100,000 square miles in size and 45,000,000 people are in the grip of the famine with 15,000,000 facing death by starvation and more than 15,000 dying every day.

A VERY heartening clipping, showing appreciation of America's aid has just been received by us. It appeared in the North-China Daily News of November 19, and we reprint it here:

"The following letters, giving an account of the ready response by the Christian Herald to an appeal for relief for victims of the famine, has been sent to us:

"To the Editor of the North-China Daily News:

"Two months ago I wrote to the editors of the Christian Herald, New York, telling them of the dire need and the great suffering of the poor people in Honan, Shansi, and Shantung. I felt sure that if they fully realized the awful state of affairs up there they would come to their relief, as they did in 1901, 1907, and 1911.

"Their answer to my letter was a cable sent me on the 4th instant, which reads as follows: 'Can you suggest Relief Fund Committee?' I cabled the names of four missionaries who are living in or near the famine district.

"I received an answer to my cable today saying: 'Approve Committee suggested. Will add several names. Funds will go through State Department. Keep us advised.' So the readers of the good old Christian Herald have come to China's relief again.

"It was my privilege to handle many tens of thousands of dollars for them in the Wahu flood famine of 1901. Then in 1907 funds flowed in from the Herald for the famine of Tsingkiangpu, Kiangsu, and at Wahu again in 1911. This gives us large hopes for this present famine.

"Not only does the Christian Herald give grandly at the time of the severe test, but for many years afterward she follows up her work in taking care of hundreds of famine orphans in different parts of the country. The industrial orphanage at Chinkiang, which is under the care of Mr. J. W. Bowler, is a grand example. This orphanage was started in 1907 and until three or four years ago was supported entirely by the Christian Herald but now by free-will offerings of friends in China and America.

"The famine field is so broad that all the funds which can be gathered from all parts of the world will be needed. A letter, therefore, to our home papers might bring to the relief many dollars. I hope the ready writers of Shanghai and Treaty Ports will, therefore, do this. A few moments' writing to papers will be seed well sown.

"Thanking you for space in your paper, I am, etc.
"Hochow, Anh., Nov. 16. "Z. CHARLES BEALS."

THE following letter to the Christian Herald from H. B. Ingalls, treasurer of the Christmas Relief Fund of the University of Illinois Community, shows the important place measures in behalf of the Chinese famine sufferers hold in the hearts of the students and the faculty of the University of Illinois.

Urbana, Illinois, December 9, 1920.

"Christian Herald Chinese Famine Fund:

"Enclosed find draft No. 703578 on the National Park Bank of New York in favor of the Christian Herald Chinese Famine Fund in the amount of $6,500.00.

"This represents the portion of the Christmas Relief Fund subscribed in the University of Illinois Community which has been assigned for the Chinese Relief Work. There will be an additional smaller remittance as soon as deferred pledges are paid in.

"A special drive was put on in the University of Illinois Community in the interest of the 'Christmas Relief Fund' and the sum of $17,500 was subscribed. The division of this fund between various relief agencies is: Christian Herald Chinese Famine Fund 50 per cent.; Literary Digest Child Feeding Fund, 40 per cent.; European Relief Council (student relief), 10 per cent."

Surely a beautiful, generous, kindly thing to consider the suffering millions of the far-off land at the time of "peace on earth, good-will to men."

CONTRIBUTIONS in increased size and numbers continue to come from our readers who have been supporting the work loyally, and the $300,000 mark is rapidly being approached. In our issue of January 8 we reported a total of $206,764.97, receipts to and including December 29. Amounts received daily since that date are:

December 30.....	$8,722.53
December 31.....	15,506.15
January 3.....	20,705.08
January 4.....	6,148.48
January 5.....	12,873.67

Grand Total.....$270,720.88

Christian Herald readers have done nobly and may well feel proud of their efforts in behalf of the famine victims. But the work must go on and the nation thoroughly aroused to the enormity of the peril threatening China.

This week's cover shows "The Madonna of Misery," and is the contribution to the China Famine Fund of Mr. Henry Raleigh, one of the most noted of American poster artists. This picture has been made into a lithographed poster and will be distributed widely over the country to carry its famine appeal.

The Church's Call to Service

A Sermon by Rev. H. P. HOSKINS *

TEXT—Isa. 56 : 6-8. "Also the sons of strangers—even them will I bring to my holy mountain and make them joyful in the house of prayer."

DOWN on Cape Cod, I am told, the traveler frequently sees at the cross-roads a sign-board with this strange device: the name of the town, figures indicating distance in miles and the capital letters M. T. Thus: "East, Dennis; 5 miles M. T." It is plain to the native but the stranger can not understand those letters "M. T." To his inquiry the passing native, with poorly concealed contempt for such ignorance, replies: "'M. T.' means 'Meeting House.'"

Simple as anything, when you have the key, like all riddles. And sensible, too. To say: "5 miles to East Dennis," simply, would raise the question at once—"What part of East Dennis? its nearest boundary, its center, its furthest boundary, or where?" But in the Cape Cod towns, the Meeting House is usually in the midst—"In the center of the middle of the town," as one native expressed it. Its white tower is seen afar. So, as the most logical thing possible, they measure distance in Cape Cod by the Meeting House.

But the Meeting House is more than a structure of wood or brick or stone. It stands for something. It stands a visible landmark of the Christian faith. It puts Christianity on the map. Its spire points to certain ideals and principles of the holy life and to the high attributes of righteousness. It is a conspicuous worker for the beauty of moral purity and the faith of our fathers. It stands for more than Plymouth Rock or Bunker Hill monument. It stands for the monumental hope that never dies and for the historic Cause that grows more precious as the years go by. It calls us not simply back to Christ, but on to Christ.

Not only do they measure distance but they measure time by the Meeting House. The history of multitudes is woven into the warp and woof of the history of the Church. "How long have you been married?" you ask an old couple. And many will say something like this: "Well, let's see: we were married by Pastor So-and-So, and he had been here about ten years, and he has been gone seventeen years, so that makes it about twenty-eight years ago since we were married." So it goes—the birth of one, the death, wedding, baptism, conversion of others—much of personal history is measured by the Meeting House.

THE bigness of the Church is determined not in feet and inches, nor in number of members, nor by money raised, but in the height of her ideals, the length of her service, and the breadth of her compassion. Where outside of the Church is there to be found any organization of men attempting or professing to establish a platform of spiritual qualifications essential to membership?

There are, to be sure, organizations, here and there, which camouflage under the name of "church," into which the world may come without confession of any sort of faith. These are purely human organizations, colorless, creedless, characterless, Crossless, Christless, where the conscience is not disturbed by such matters as sin, salvation, or sacrifice, and into some of them the world has to step down to get over the door-step. The world loves to gravitate, and if you will find me a religious leader who is willing to lower moral and spiritual standards, I will find you a thousand who will follow him. Statistics do not tell the whole story.

A community can estimate the Christian religion by no higher standard than by its church. There is no better Church here than our Church, and no more noble expression of the faith of Christ in operation in human lives.

But are we satisfied with that, or does that fact come to us as a tremendous challenge to create a nobler standard? Must not the history of the future Church be more glorious than the history of the past? Must it not be a real shepherd of souls? Must not tomorrow be more inspiring than yesterday?

How far are we from the Meeting House? How far, I mean, from the noblest spiritual ideals for which the quaint old white-painted building stands? Not in distance, not in time, but in spiritual approach. And which way are we traveling? Are we headed toward or away from the heavenly goal? Are our footprints, on the sands of time, safe ones for the coming generation to follow? Men of the world are asking some very plain questions of the men of the Meeting House these days. One question is, "Why are you here?" That is a fair question, too. Have you ever thought much about it? Are we doing anything of value that would not be done if we should decide next Sunday to go out of business?

THE product of the Meeting House is not so many sermons preached, so many hymns sung, prayers offered, money raised as added investment made to our equipment. Our product is in moral character created and in souls won to Christ. If we have not these products to show, and if our converts are not better men and women than they were before they were converted, have we anything to show why we should stay in business? If I can say, "Yes; the blind understand, the foul are made clean, the deaf hear, those dead in sin are made alive, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them," then I have an irresistible argument for the Church. Then we are "efficient" from a spiritual standpoint. Sustaining our own, or the moral dignity of the community is not efficiency of a high class.

The world of Jesus' day would have cared little for what He believed had it not been eye-witness to the life He lived and seen the things He did. This community cares very little for what we think and teach from our pulpits or Sunday school. But it is wonderfully impressed by the good things we do and the good lives we live.

munity. She must lift her voice in no uncertain tone against the commercializing of the Lord's Day and against other recognized social vices. She must let the community know that those who favor such things have no standing within her borders. She must exalt Christ at all times, for He, being lifted up, will draw all men unto Him.

Further, the Church must be a Real School of the Bible. Teaching and preaching the Word is a big part of our work and many times is done the most indifferently. Ninety per cent. of the accessions to our churches come from our Sunday schools, and it is estimated that seventy per cent. of those in attendance in the primary grades are lost to the school and Church before they reach the age of twenty-one.

The Church must minister, continually and unitedly, to the homes of the community. That means personal visitation, under some well-worked-out system, and done in wisdom and in love. The church must be "homey," glowing with cordiality and brotherliness, so that strangers must be made to feel it. We must have fire enough in our hearts to keep up a holy glow. It is a good idea to get the conviction broadcast that your church is a "friendly" church. The development of spiritual life is conditioned largely by the temperature of the church. Sympathy is sweet and kindness is satisfying. So, if we are going to keep the Church on the map, we should consider carefully: "Are you really doing anything to win souls to Christ?" Then shall come to pass the words of the Lord as voiced by Isaiah: "Also the sons of the strangers will I bring to my holy mountain and make them joyful in the House of Prayer."

We are here because the sons of the strangers are walking the streets, and the multitude is without a shepherd. We are here because sin is here. We are here to combat the evil influence of the world, to arrest the hand of injustice, to smite the power of oppression, to preach the Truth of the glorious Gospel that "makes men free," to open eyes, long blind to the glory of God and to His grace that saves to the uttermost, to wipe away tears, to comfort the sad, to give the message of a free salvation to all within our reach, and to point men and women to the life to come.

One Church's Activities

By C. W. FOUST

FOR years Collingswood, New Jersey, has been alive to wonderful results from the evangelistic activities and methods of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, and the place has been practically made over through what that church has been "doing for the community." It can be told only in facts:

It is a live church with all-the-week-open doors. In it are meetings of some kind, morning, afternoon and night, almost daily.

The entire community has been uplifted through this medium for right, which does not resort to plays, suppers, dances, shows, fairs or any other so-called religious money-making stunts.

It helps the community by offering something for nothing—spiritual advice.

Its large expense account is paid through free-will offerings, and it is always giving, giving, giving.

The church took a Chinese student, paid his college tuition for four years and now is paying his way through a seminary preparing him for the Chinese missionary field. It prepared and sent a young missionary to India, a young woman missionary to China and a school teacher to China in missionary educational work. Another student is completing a college course at the expense of the church, for missionary work in Africa.

There is no end to its evangelistic work—two long revivals annually and a continued drive for penitents.

Scores of religious services have been held on the streets with good results.

It attracts hundreds by straightforward preaching of Christ crucified, and presents no show-like or worldly features.

Hundreds of boys and girls are given musical and physical training and instruction in different recreations weekly, and are induced to participate in social affairs under proper supervision.

Scores of personal workers are continually doing their best for the community, with a response that makes the town famous for its remarkable church.

Its hundreds of voters have stood unequivocally for prohibition, keeping the place dry; and the church, by taking politics into its discussions, has helped in numerous reforms in the town.

It organized three missions which today are strong churches.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"More Love to Thee, O Christ," or "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Matt. 25 : 31-46.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 79, first column.)

Sermon—"THE CHURCH'S CALL TO SERVICE"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour Dear," or "Abide with Me, Fast Falls the Eventide."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

We come as children to a father, as pupils to a teacher, as sick to the Good Physician, as poor to the merciful rich, as sinners to the Saviour. In all our need, whatever it may be, we know Thou canst supply it—Thou who art infinite in power, love, courage and forgiveness. Through Jesus Christ our Lord, AMEN.

Of course what we think and believe is back of what we do; but the world does not know that. Little does the man passing on the street care because you are a Baptist, you are a Presbyterian, or you are a Methodist, or so on? Denominational labels are poor things with which to establish points of contact with a lost world. The world is wise in its own way. It comes to church suppers, but it does not come to Christ—not that way. The world takes the bait off the hook while we think we are fishing for men. So while we may say in answer to the question: "Why are you here?" "We are here to teach the will of God," we must also answer: "We are here to do the will of God, which is to bring men and women into the Kingdom."

Never should we get the idea uppermost in our minds that we are seeking first in the more material sense "to build up the Church." We are here, as a Church, to build up the community. If the Church does not work its field, that field will be choked with weeds and tares.

HERE I would suggest some vital points at which we must make good if we are to be a growing, ministering Church with growing influence. We must be the center of spiritual inspiration. All we do must bend toward a great spiritual objective. We must never lose sight, nor let the community lose sight, of the fact that we keep before us this chief objective. All who touch the Church, at any point, must feel that it is the center of spiritual inspiration. Our chief business is not to furnish entertainment or physical culture, but to be a means to grace and the salvation of precious souls.

The Church must be a real moral force in its com-

The Prayer That Transfigures

SUNDAY. Luke 9 : 28, 29. "Jesus went up into a mountain to pray. And as he prayed the fashion of His countenance was altered, and His raiment was white and glistening." Let us get the scene well fixed in our imaginations. The Master is away up in the mountain; the heavy dew is lying upon the grass; the breeze is softly blowing, that breeze which seems to be always moving upon the lower slopes of Hermon, perhaps cooled by the snows beyond. And there He kneels, the Master, the Lord, and He prays!

I want us to realize that all prayer is more than speech with God. Prayer is infinitely more than pleading. I sometimes wish—I say it with the utmost deliberateness—I sometimes wish we could drop the word "plead" quite out of our religious vocabulary. We so frequently pray as though we had got an indifferent and unwilling God with whom we have to plead. The cardinal necessity in prayer is not pleading, but receiving. I do not believe—I say it with a full sense of responsibility—I do not believe we have any more need to plead with God to bless than to plead with the air outside to come into a building. It is not so much pleading that is required as the making of an inlet. God is willing. Prayer is simply communion; the opening up of channels of companionship; the opening out of mind, the opening out of will, in order that into the open mind and will and conscience there may flow the Divine energy and the Divine grace.

"Jesus prayed" means that He was absolutely open to the Infinite. Surely that is the meaning of prayer. When a man prays, if he prays aright, he is simply opening himself out to the incoming of God. God says, "Behold! I stand at the door and knock; I enshrine and surround you like the atmosphere." Prayer is conscious receptiveness in the presence of the Divine. Jesus, upon the mountain height, in the evening time prayed, He opened Himself to God, the Infinite, and the Infinite began to possess Him.

"And as He prayed, He was transfigured." I am not surprised at that. Even among men we have seen the ministry of transfiguration, though in infinitely smaller degree. You remember that Moses had been so opened out to God, and so possessed by the Divine light, that when he came down from the mount his face shone with mystic radiance. We are told concerning Stephen that he was so opened out to the Infinite that they saw his face as it had been the face of an angel. He was simply possessed and pervaded by the Divine power.

And surely one may say, as I can say, that in far humbler life than that of Moses, in life in which there has been little of what the world calls "culture," little of mental furniture, little of dialectical power, but in which there has been great spiritual receptiveness, in the lives of the illiterate there has shone "a light that never was on sea or land." But here with the Master, whose life was absolutely and uninterruptedly opened out to the glory of the God-head, the inflow of glory transfigured and transformed Him, and in superlative and supreme degree "His face did shine as the sun." The very expression of His countenance was altered.

And then the historians go even further, for we are told that the glory, the energy, I scarcely know how to describe it—one uses an almost violent phrase in seeking to give expression to it—the Divine effluence which flowed into the Lord not only transfigured His flesh, but in some mystic way transfigured even His outer vesture. "His garments became white as snow." All of which just means this: that this man of Nazareth became so absolutely filled with God that His very material vesture was transfigured and transformed. "We were eye-witnesses of it."

Seeking God Early

MONDAY. Prov. 8 : 17. "I love them that love me; and those that seek me early shall find me." The child is the true citizen of the Kingdom of God. We know this on the highest authority. Jesus taught grown people that they must become like little children in order to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. We make a great mistake when we teach little children that they must become like grown folks in order to be good Christians. Knowing this, and believing this with all our hearts, nevertheless there is such a thing as child-conversion. Perhaps it may make it seem more natural if we think of it as child-decision.

Count Zinzendorf began earnestly to seek after God in his fourth year, and he was only a child when he framed a covenant which ran thus: "Be thou mine, dear Saviour, and I will be Thine," a covenant which was often afterward renewed. At the age of nineteen he said, "Eternity alone fills my thought." At a later period he wrote, "I am as ever, a poor sinner, a captive of eternal love, running by the side of His triumphal chariot, and have no desire to be anything else as long as I live." The Earl of Shaftesbury was not yet seven years of age when his heart yearned after a knowledge of God. His faithful nurse touched the chords and awakened the first music of his spiritual life by telling him the story of Jesus' birth and death. Alfred Cookman sought and obtained a divine experience of grace at ten years. Isaac Watts definitely decided to live for God at nine years. Robert Hall became a Christian at twelve, and Jonathan Edwards, greatest of American logicians and theologians, was converted at seven.

It is one of the most significant findings of students of varieties of Christian experience that a vast majority of Christians arrive at a decision concerning Christ and enter into covenant with God during the years from twelve to eighteen. These are the fateful years. Joseph Cook called them "tender teens." Only one who seeks God early can know the joy of perfect obedience. Augustine confessed, "Too late I loved thee, thou Ancient of Days, yet ever young."

Abram and Lot

TUESDAY. Gen. 13 : 1. "And Abram went up out of Egypt, . . . and Lot with him." Here are two men who represent two types of believers. You can always trust them both to run true to form. Abram is the God-influenced man and Lot is the man-influenced man. You always find Abram trusting in God to lead him, while you always find Lot either trusting in Abram or himself. Abram's life was largely under the divine influence of God, while Lot's life was under the human influence of Abram. It is no wonder that Lot is continually getting into trouble, and when in trouble, always compelled to seek the aid of Abram.

The Abrams of this world are always helping the Lots out. For the man who only looks to himself is finally compelled to seek the aid of the man who looks to God.

Lot is forever choosing that which is best for himself, while Abram is contented to believe that God will guide him aright, and select only that which is best for him.

Abram, having taken God, knows that he will get everything that comes with God—a wisdom which is infinite, a life which is eternal, and a power which is unending. So, unpopular as it might be, Abram puts his life in the hand of God and humbly follows on.

The Abundance of His Goodness

WEDNESDAY. I Kings 10 : 13. "King Solomon gave to the Queen of Sheba whatsoever she asked; beside that, he gave her of his royal bounty." Solomon's wisdom answered the Queen's questions; his riches dazzled her vision, so she exclaimed, "I believed not until I came and mine eyes have seen; behold, the half was not told me." God gives of His infinite riches; after granting our petitions, He gives of His royal bounty according to His kingly glory, much more than we can ask or think. He supplies all our need according to His boundless power and love.

Solomon in all his glory was not clothed with the beauty of even the perishing flowers. How much more God clothes His immortal children with unfading robes of purity and righteousness. He who is true to care for the birds and flowers, will He not much more care for you? After our little prayers are answered, His royal bounty will bestow the love that passeth knowledge, the joy unspeakable, the exceeding, abundant grace from the treasury of His infinite supply.

When we compare man's splendor and generosity with God's infinite treasures of being, we must ever use the words, "How much more!" If devoted parents give good gifts to their children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them who ask Him?

Deliverance from Evil

THURSDAY. Matt. 6 : 13. "Deliver us from evil." The seventh petition in the Lord's Prayer is really a summary of the whole, since deliverance from evil means practically an answer to all the other petitions. Deliverance from evil is not mere negative goodness, since negative goodness itself is an evil, for it is not a complete good. Whether the Master taught us to pray, "Deliver us from evil," or "Deliver us from the evil one," is not material. If we are delivered from evil, surely we shall be delivered from the spirit that is the author of evil.

But what is evil? We must know what we are to be delivered from. Certainly some things are evil which may not seem so. And some that look like evil are not. Pain, for instance. How often out of pain the greatest good may come! Moreover, some things that seem evil are only good in the making. A Mexican poet has written,

"All things climb a starry stair,
By a law that no man knows,
What was yesterday a thorn
Shall tomorrow be a rose;
What is now a chrysalis
Soon shall soar, free-fluttering;
What was yesterday a wish
May tomorrow be a wing!"

Plato, wise as he was, confessed his inability to determine what is good and what is evil, so he adopted the prayer of a poet: "Grant us the good we fail to ask for, and deny us the evil we ignorantly seek."

But Jesus Christ knew what is good and what is evil. His vision was clear. "His bright-mirrored soul reflected only light." If He had only told us! He did. He does. Where? In this very prayer. Evil is the opposite of good, but in the Lord's Prayer we have the Master's own conception not alone of what is good but of what is best: reverence for holy things; a consuming regard for the Kingdom of God; submissiveness to the Father's will; daily food; forgiveness and forgiveness; guidance. These are the things we are taught to pray for. Having these, we are completely delivered from evil.

C. C. A.

The Whole Armor

FRIDAY. Eph. 6 : 13. "Take unto you the whole armor of God." If we did not have to fight, we would not need an armor; but the fact that we have to fight the good fight of faith, necessitates that we shall wear the armor of God. It is foolish to enter a fight of this kind without sufficient equipment and protection.

No one can doubt that the faith once delivered to the saints is being attacked today, and that there are many in the world who would rejoice in seeing this faith defeated. This is impossible, because God's truth is an eternal as the heavens and is bound to conquer.

Much of the battle for the triumph of the Truth must be fought by the Christians, and, for the battle nothing less than the whole armor will be sufficient.

I like to think that these words, "Put on the whole armor of God," really mean that we are to be clothed with God—that is, that we are to put on God as an armor, for this gives us assurance that we are arming ourselves with the One who makes victory certain. Now we are ready to go out and fight the good fight of faith. This is not an uncertain battle, but one in which we are sure to win an eternal triumph.

W. W. B.

"Who Is on the Lord's Side?"

SATURDAY. I Sam. 17 : 47. "For the battle is the Lord's." So David spoke to the giant Goliath. It is true that the sword and spear and great numbers do not always win. Solomon uttered similar wisdom when he said: "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." Faith in the wisdom and guidance of the Almighty wins the real victory. The little David slew Goliath; the maid, Joan of Arc, won victory for France. God's winds and waves swept the Spanish Armada on the rocks of ruin. His snows in Russia blocked Napoleon's ambition to rule the world. He overwhelmed the Teutonic hosts in the Great War. His stars in their courses always fight for the right, for nature's powers are on the side of truth. The winds become His messengers, the lightning doeth His will; all the laws of the universe are against those who do evil, among individuals and nations. Truth evermore conquers a lie. He always wins who sides with God.

His forces were against slavery and rum; their fall in America is only a precursor of universal freedom from the twin evils of the race. The individual who violates the laws of body and soul health, will soon lose both; he finds himself fighting for pleasure against God's unchangeable edicts, which carry their penalties with them. Sin is rebellion against law; winning for a season only makes ruin more terrible at last. Who is on the Lord's side will win; the sinners' side will lose; the Judge of all the earth will do right. In His moral universe, those who come to Him are the saved; those who reject Him are banished.

Jesus Greeted as King

International Sunday School Lesson for January 30

Matt. 21 : 1-46

By LUTHER DENNY WHITTEMORE, Litt.D.

THE triumphal entrance of Jesus into the city of Jerusalem makes a powerful appeal to the imagination. The picturesque description written long afterwards by each of the four Gospel writers shows how vivid was the impression made upon the minds of those who witnessed or who took part in the events described, an impression indelibly stamped upon the memory because of the contrast between the display of popular enthusiasm and the crucifixion which so quickly followed. The modern reader of the narratives, after all the intervening centuries, experiences a sympathetic thrill as he contemplates the scene with its outbreak of spontaneous enthusiasm and its underlying pathos.

If one would fully understand the meaning of that first "Palm Sunday," he must be more than a disinterested spectator. In imagination he must be a participant in the dramatic action, identifying himself successively with the different actors, becoming one of the shouting multitude carried away with momentary enthusiasm, or one of the two disciples sent to fetch the colt for the Master's use, or—something more difficult, if not impossible—he must put himself in Jesus' place, gracefully accepting the homage of the multitude and yet knowing that His kingdom was not of this world. One must realize also the ever-present and increasing hostility of those who were watching for the most favorable opportunity to destroy Jesus, whose popularity they regarded as a menace to the established order of things and a hindrance to their personal advantage.

Although we may represent in imagination the spectacular aspects of the scene, it is difficult to analyze and explain the conflicting ideals and forces which were represented; and if this is difficult for us who are familiar with the subsequent events, how confused the issues must have seemed to those who had no lamp except experience to guide them!

THE key to the explanation is, of course, the popular conception of the kingdom of heaven in Jesus' time. The most glorious period of Jewish history was that of David's kingdom, and nothing better could be desired by patriotic Jews than its restoration. When Jesus began to preach He used the term, "the kingdom of heaven"; and although in language that today seems unmistakable, He revealed the spiritual character of that kingdom, neither the multitude, although they heard Him gladly, nor the disciples, although they were His intimate associates, seemed to comprehend His meaning. Nothing that Jesus said concerning the kingdom of heaven implied that He proposed to establish a political kingdom with Jerusalem as its capital; but on the journey to Jerusalem the disciples had disputed among themselves who should be the greatest in His kingdom; and the multitude, believing that the long-expected time had actually come, greeted Him as if He were immediately to become in fact the king of the Jews in accordance with their own conception.

In the crisis created by the triumphal entry three factors were involved, with each of which Jesus was immediately concerned—the attitude of His disciples, the expectation of the multitude, and the hostility of the leaders of the Jews.

To the disciples He had already unfolded the principles of the kingdom of heaven, teaching them, as never man had taught, that the kingdom of heaven is within the heart of the individual who does the will of God; that it is a life instead of an institution; that its law is love rather than rules of conduct; and that its activity is service rather than dominion. Jesus had assured Himself of the personal loyalty of His disciples before He had ventured to tell them what He was to suffer. He also trusted them, and He knew that the experience which awaited them would test but not overcome their faith. All that He could do to confirm their faith was to show by His own example that life was saved by losing it. In the intervals between the trying scenes of Passion week He gave His final instructions to His disciples, commanding them to love one another as He had loved them, and to show their love for Him by doing the things which He had taught them. In wonderful ways His words came back to them after He had been taken from them, in accordance with His promise. "If I go away, I will come again unto you."

The multitude had faith in Jesus' superhuman power, but they had no clear conception of His spiritual kingdom. The most appropriate response which they knew how to make in return for the blessings which they had received and in anticipation of the greater blessings which they expected was to greet Jesus as a king, to shout hosannas, and to spread their garments and branches in His path.

Jesus did not rebuke the misdirected enthusiasm of the multitude nor did He meet their expectations. He could not have been tempted then to change His policy and assume political power, for that issue had been settled once for all when He first met the tempter. His reaction towards the popular uprising can best be explained as an enacted parable in which He displayed not royal power but divine meekness. The most effective way by which He could impress His ideals upon the masses in Jerusalem, as well as upon the whole world, was by going calmly on His way and by giving His life as ransom for many.

THE ideals of the Jewish rulers were precisely the opposite of the ideals of Jesus. They believed and taught that the essential thing in a blameless life was punctilious observance of the law. "What commandment is the greatest?" was the favorite expression of their point of view; but Jesus taught that if a man loved God and his neighbor, essential obedience to the law would follow. He called for a righteousness that exceeded that of the scribes and Pharisees. Their ideal was conformity to the letter of the law; His was the manifestation of the spirit of brotherly kindness. In the prevalence of this new doctrine they saw the end of their authority, and hence regarded Jesus as an enemy and sought occasion to destroy Him.

This attitude Jesus met with fearless denunciation. He did not resent personal attacks, but hypocrisy and disloyalty to His Heavenly Father aroused His righteous indignation. He drove the impious profiteers from the temple, His Father's house, and refused to answer when questioned concerning the source of His authority.

In these stirring events described so vividly in Matthew and the other Gospels, Jesus reveals a new and sterner phase of His personality, but one feels that His purpose is unchanged. He is God's representative in the world, calling upon all men to repent, proclaiming the coming of the kingdom of heaven, teaching its fundamental principles, preparing His disciples for their great mission, leading the multitudes towards a true and spiritual conception of the kingdom, and advancing step by step towards the destiny that awaited Him.

In all this Jesus reveals kingly qualities, not because He is like the kings who rule in worldly kingdoms, but because He is the pattern for kings to imitate. In greeting Him as king the multitude showed their loyalty to their conception of the son of David. May we be equally loyal to our conception of the Son of God.

new paths of service in the world of thought.

Two glee clubs, the McCormick, for older boys, and the Junior for younger boys, are developing the vocal abilities of the membership. Chorus singing is an excellent means of outlet for accumulated steam, and a fine training in the better kind of "pull together" spirit. Latent musical talent has been seized upon for the organization of an orchestra of 14 pieces under competent direction. Another means of educating the youngsters in team work and self-discipline is the dramatic group. There are opportunities here to correct the slipshod speech and crudities of manner which are the natural consequence of environment, as well as to inculcate ethical principles, and these are being employed to the best advantage.

CLASSES in stenography have been organized, and a group of boys who have become impressed with the chance for self-improvement is busily engaged in learning how to write shorthand and to use the typewriter.

Manual training is not overlooked. There are now five woodworking groups, whose occupation is the making of toys and small articles of utility. These, in themselves, may not be of great value, but the training in exactness of measurements, neatness of finish, skill in handling tools, and the awakening of the creative and constructive desire are results of the highest importance. Smaller boys make scrap-books, an entertaining task which requires many of the same qualifications and contributes toward a like end.

One of the finest rooms in the club building has been set apart as a library and reading-room. It is on the first floor, far enough removed from the game-rooms to be undisturbed, and enjoying the advantage of half a dozen big windows which let in all the light of the day. Here there have been assembled books which specially interest the boy, many of them donated by members of the Union League Club. There are story books, scout books, books of travel and biography, and books which tell how to make everything from a top to a locomotive. On the tables are magazines, entertaining and informative. The library is going to be a frequent resort for the young debaters of the discussion clubs, as well as for other lads seeking knowledge about a multitude of things in which their interest is being aroused. Not the least of its values will be to teach these boys how to use books of reference, how to make the accumulated lore of the world a part of their own lives, and applicable to their own tasks and ambitions.

Mr. Klees moved about in this world of red-blooded, mischief-loving juvenility, unfearful but respected. He called its individual members by their nick-names. He showed familiarity with their characteristics. When an authoritative word was needed he spoke it firmly and it was obeyed.

"I have an office on the first floor," he said, "but I am seldom in it. I keep moving about. I can exercise a greater influence by being with the boys, first here and then there. I have no rules. You will find none posted on the walls. Occasions must be dealt with as they arise, and each boy must be handled as an individual. Formal rules are of no real value. They only invite somebody to break them. But I tell the boys this is their club, and it is up to them to see that it is cared for and that the behavior is what it ought to be."

HOW far is the club's aim being achieved? Let the Juvenile Court records tell the story. In the nine months that the club has been in existence juvenile delinquency has decreased by 43 per cent. in its neighborhood: Few investments show such quick returns. Here are dividends worth working for. Here is justification from a business standpoint for this venture of business men. Out of this club will come citizens who respect the law, who love their country, who have standards of honesty and industry, who will be producers of wealth or contributors of service in the community.

Perhaps these business men do not realize it—all of them—but in this plant which they have bought and equipped, and which they are running with business sagacity, they are doing a work which brings them into partnership with that Nazareth Carpenter, Who, from the tasks of His shop, went to the bigger task of laying foundations for a society in which the spirit of righteousness and brotherhood should prevail; Who made character the chief aim of His effort, and Who recognized in childhood the raw material from which the Kingdom of Heaven must be built.

The Union League Boys' Club is affiliated with the Federation of Boys' Clubs, an organization with headquarters in New York, but holding for its field the continent, wherever the boy is found.

The Union League Club of Chicago entertains the hope that what it has done will prompt other like organizations to engage in similar enterprises. It has a vision of every city in America with a plant for the making of good citizens from the neglected human material of its streets. If it can help by advice and suggestion, out of its experience, it will be glad to help. In the meantime its members are enjoying the satisfaction of witnessing for themselves the results of their work. "Let's go over to the boys' club tonight and clip a few coupons," has been a by-word among the members, to whom grins on grimy urchin faces are a better return than any that they measure in dollars.

Shanghai's Community Church

SHANGHAI, China, has a community church which is the direct outgrowth of an American song service organized by Americans three years ago. From an original attendance of twenty, the congregation has grown to an average Sunday attendance of three hundred; and on the last Sunday in September a definite community church organization was formed, officers elected and steps taken for the incorporation of the church, as the result of a movement which had been gaining headway for several months.

As its pastor, the congregation has engaged Dr. Luther Freeman, formerly connected with Boston University, but for several years the pastor of one of the large churches in Pittsburg.

The Community Church will be un-denominational in character and the American style of service will be used, with membership open to persons of all nationalities who desire to subscribe to the bond of union covered in the constitution. The plans of the leaders in the enterprise call for the erection of a church structure.

The scope and purpose of the organization is shown by the following paragraph taken from the prospectus which was sent to the Americans in the city:

"The modern movement towards unity, and a more cordial spirit of fellowship among Christians are evidenced by the churches which have been established and are operating successfully in a number of the newer and growing cities of the United States. Instead of starting several struggling, competing churches, the residents of a district agree to unite upon the most simple and fundamental principles of Christian faith, and to work together as one strong and enthusiastic body. It is such a church that is wanted in the Western district of Shanghai, where Christians of various denominations and nationalities may find a real church home. This project, on broad lines, has been undertaken by the American Song Service, and it has had the indorsement of the committees of churches in the older parts of the city, and also of committees representative of the business community."

The work requires no experience. All you need to do is to show your friends and acquaintances the four hundred actual samples we furnish you. Exquisite embroidered robes—beautiful dress goods of every description, both imported and American made—unusual and artistic drapery fabrics. Our imported materials in dress and blouse lengths are exclusive—never shown in American shops—and sold only through our representatives. Women are so enthusiastic over their beauty that a representative often sells material for two or three embroidered robes in one home.

Our imported embroidered patterns range in price from $4.35 to $24.75. Our dress materials range in price from 49c. to $6.75 a yard.

It is easy to get started. Many of our representatives who never did any work of this kind before are now earning good money for themselves. Here is a typical way in which they go about it:

Mrs. Patten of California says: "I just called on my friends and all were so delighted with the beautiful goods, they would ask me to show them to some of their friends."

Get started early before women buy their new dress goods. The earlier you start the more money you will make for yourself.

You can use your spare time

You can give as little or as much time as you wish. Mrs. Williams of Minnesota can devote only her evenings to Schweizer work, but in only a few months she made over $300 profit. Mrs. Trueblood of California says: "During the last year I have paid all expenses on my ten-acre orange ranch as well as my own living from my earnings, devoting about half my time to your work." If women who work only part time can make incomes like these, you can readily see how much money you could make by giving all your time to this work.

It was little Lily who created a diversion. She had been standing, very quietly, in the shelter of their arms for some time—she had a way of standing with an infinite patience, for hours, in one place. But suddenly, as if drawn by some instinct, she dropped down on the floor, beside the cheap suitcase, and her small hands shaking with eagerness, started to take out the clothes that had been packed.

It was uncanny, almost, to see the child so happily beginning to unpack the suitcase. The sight dried Rose-Marie's tears in an almost miraculous way.

"Let's put away the things," she suggested shakily, to Ella. "For you won't be going away, now, will you?"

THE face that Ella Volsky lifted was a changed face. Her expression was a shade more wistful, perhaps, but the somber glow had gone out of her eyes, leaving them softer than Rose-Marie had supposed possible.

"No, Miss," she said quietly, "I won't be going—away. You're right, it ain't worth the price!" And the incident, from that moment, was closed.

They unpacked the garments—there weren't many of them—quietly. But Rose-Marie was very glad, deep in her soul, and she somehow felt that Ella's mind was relieved of a tremendous strain. They didn't speak again, but there was something in the way Ella's hand touched her little sister's sunny hair that was more poignant than words. And there was something in the way Rose-Marie's mouth curved blithely up that told a whole story of satisfaction and content. If seemed as if peace, with her white wings folded and at rest, was hovering, at last, above the Volsky flat.

And then, all at once, the momentary lull was over. All at once the calm was broken as a bubble pricked by a pin is broken. There was a sudden burst of noise in the front room; of rough words; of a woman sobbing. There was the sound of Mrs. Volsky's voice, raised in an unwonted cry of anguish, there was a trickle of water slithering down upon an uncarpeted floor—as if the washtub had been overturned.

It was the final event of an unsettling day—the last straw. Forgetting Lily, forgetting the unpacking, Rose-Marie jumped to her feet, ran to the door. Ella followed. They stood together on the threshold of the outer room, and stared.

THE outer room seemed full of people, shouting gesticulating people. And in the foreground stood Jim—as sleek and well groomed as ever. Of all the crowd he seemed the only one who was composed. In front of him stood Mrs. Volsky—her face drawn and white, her hands clasped in a way that was singularly and primitively appealing.

"Oh, he ain't," she was moaning, "say that he ain't! My man—he could not be so! There ain't no truth in it—there can't be no truth. . . . Say as he ain't been done to so bad! Say it!"

Ella, with a movement that was all at once love-filled, stepped quickly to the mother's side. As she faced the crowd—and Jim—her face was also drawn; drawn and apprehensive.

"What's up?" she queried tersely of her brother, "What's up?"

The face of Jim was almost smiling as he answered, so calm he was. Behind him the foreign voices of the crowd sounded, like a background to the blunt words that he spoke.

"Pa was comin' home drunk," he told Ella, "an' he got ran inter by a truck. He was smashed up pretty bad; dead right away, th' cop said. But they took him ter a hospital jus' th' same. Wonder why they'd take a stiff ter a hospital?"

Mrs. Volsky's usually colorless voice was breaking into loud, almost weird lamentation. Ella stood speechless. But Rose-Marie, the horror of it all striking to her very soul, spoke.

"It can't be true," she cried, starting forward and—in the excitement of the moment—laying her hand upon Jim's perfectly tailored coat sleeve. "It can't be true. . . . It's too terrible!"

Jim's laugh rang out heartlessly, eerily, upon the air.

"It ain't so terrible!" he told Rose-Marie. "Pa—he wasn't no good! He wasn't a reg'lar feller—like me." All at once his well-manicured white hand crept down over her hand. "He wasn't a reg'lar feller," he repeated, "like me!"

The Hand Clasp of Neighbors

OUR scripture reference is a chapter on "Neighborliness." It is a very early bit of literature on the subject. Of late years the word "neighbor" has become a large word in the vocabulary of our thinking. The question "Who is my neighbor?" is not asked so frequently. The reason for this is attributed to mission study, the spread of the Gospel, and the new emphasis placed on the study of sociology.

The teaching of the New Testament enables us to realize that "all we are brethren." "We are members one of another." We are all members of one family. There is no finer thing under the sun than the idea and ideal of the neighborly attitude in church, community, county, state, country and international life. Speaking in the strictly Christian sense, the Church has already established a "League of Nations." When China faces a famine, we feel it. When five million war orphans are facing the winter, we are concerned. When stricken Armenians are suffering, we are deeply conscious of the fact. The Christian Herald family wants to be neighborly. It wants to co-operate with all other agencies and organizations of philanthropy and altruism for the relief of suffering.

He who wants a neighbor must be a neighbor. He who wants a friend must be a friend. Some day we shall all stand before the great Neighbor of All Mankind. For some the verdict shall be "Inasmuch as ye have done" and for some the verdict shall be "Inasmuch as ye have NOT done." The neighbor is the doer. The unneighborly person does not. True Christians are neighbors, one helping the other. Isaiah has given us a beautiful picture: "They helped every one his neighbor and every one said to his brother 'be of good courage.'"

Accomplishments—Possibilities

THE writer advises the head of the missionary department to write to the American Baptist Publication Society for Young People's Service, a valuable publication that will contain for the next year the details of the work of the missionaries of the denomination, giving names, biography and location.

After all, our position is not "Lord, what shall this man do?" or "Lord, what has So and So done?" but "Lord, show me, through their lives, the lives of thy servants, the things thou hast for me to do." We know that the Bible is an inspired book. God still inspires men and women to deeds of heroism and sacrifice. He inspires us to "go and do likewise" through these modern heroes of the Cross. The true mission of life is to go about doing good. The world has its rounders, but the Church has roundabouts. He truly is a disciple of the Great Doer, who also does good. That is the only test of discipleship.

program. Senator Borah predicted that the suggested program would cost nearer $1,000,000 than $50,000, and other members of Congress joined him in demanding economy. Edward B. McLean, chairman of the Citizens' Inaugural Committee, denied the federal expenditures would be lavish, declaring the inaugural reception and ball would be self-supporting, and other expenses would be held down.

Mr. Harding, in his Marion conferences, was encountering difficulties, as opposition from this source or that arose to the men under consideration for Cabinet positions. The newspaper correspondents were less positive in making up slates for the cabinet and were predicting changes in the lists on which they had agreed a week before. It was said Charles E. Hughes had returned no answers to "feelers" regarding his willingness to accept the Secretaryship of State, and that Mr. Harding might find it necessary to delay announcement of his selections for the most important portfolios.

Something of Mr. Harding's worries crept into a brief speech which he delivered at the Masonic Temple in Columbus. "I wonder if you know just the feelings of a man who has been called to the greatest office in the world?" he said. "There is an aloofness of his friends, and this is one of the sad things. And in me there is a deepening sense of responsibility. I have found already that intrigue and untruth must be guarded against. One must ever be on his guard. This everlasting standing on one's guard spoils a man. I wish for an atmosphere of truth and sincerity in our government, and I have no higher ambition to establish during my administration than an autocracy of service."

DOMESTIC

FIRE DESTROYS WEST VIRGINIA CAPITOL. The capitol of West Virginia, with many of the priceless records of the various departments of the state government, was destroyed by a fire which left standing only the brick shell of the imposing structure. Two men were killed when part of the roof caved in. The property loss amounted to several million dollars.

NUMBER IDLE ESTIMATED AT 2,325,000. A total of 2,325,000 workers now are out of employment, according to a survey made by Clint C. Houston, for Labor, the organ of the Plumb Plan League. The building trades, with 300,000 idle, furnished the largest group.

EDUCATIONAL UNITY URGED. Resolutions providing that all matters of education undertaken by the Protestant churches of America be placed under the control of a central governing body, instead of being delegated to various boards which have little relation one to another, were adopted at the annual meeting of the Council of Church Boards of Education at Park Hill-on-Hudson, N. Y. Educational boards of eighteen denominations were represented at the sessions, which were designed to bring about closer co-operation and co-ordination of all branches of teaching work, and an exchange of educational information.

BILL FOR LARGER HOUSE MEMBERSHIP ADVANCED. The House Census Committee has reported a bill to raise the membership of the House to 483, allowing one representative for 218,979 inhabitants. Under this bill no state would lose a seat and forty-eight members would be added to the membership.

VON BETHMANN-HOLLWEG DIES. Dr. Theobald von Bethmann-Hollweg, who was German Imperial Chancellor from 1909 until July 4, 1917, died from acute pneumonia after a four days' illness at his estate near Berlin. He was sixty-four years old. His reference to the treaty with Belgium as "a scrap of paper" furnished a rallying cry for the Allies, but in the main Bethmann-Hollweg's administration was weak and vacillating, and he fell at last because of the hostility of the Crown Prince and the war party.

214 LOST ON SPANISH VESSEL. The Spanish steamship Santa Isabel carried 214 persons to death when she was wrecked off the northwestern coast of Spain in a storm which drove her on the rocks. Only 53 of those on board were saved, and many of these were injured.

GREEK KING ADDRESSES ASSEMBLY. King Constantine, in his message to the new Greek Assembly, urged changes in the constitution which would make the government more democratic. The King read the message in person, with Queen Sophie standing at his side.

LABOR CONFERENCES IN MEXICO CITY. The Pan-American Federation of Labor Conference, the third of its kind, has opened in Mexico City, with delegates from eighteen countries in the western hemisphere attending. Samuel Gompers and fourteen other representatives of American labor were present.

FRENCH ARE ATTACKED IN AINTAB. The Turkish Nationalists have made several attacks in an attempt to capture Aintab, and the French forces were compelled to withdraw to stronger positions. The Turkish-Armenian peace negotiations were continuing.

IRISH PEACE PARLEYS FRUITLESS. Peace discussions between Premier Lloyd George and an emissary of the Sinn Fein have revealed an unyielding attitude on both sides, and prospects for an agreement were slight. The Sinn Fein refused to accept the new Home Rule act.

Questions and Answers

A. R. B., Salem, Oreg., writes, regarding our recent editorial discussion of Sunday observance: "Is this matter of Sunday observance, or perhaps better say Sunday desecration, a matter of sin? If it is, then it is a matter of the heart, for all sin is a heart matter. That being true, is civil government—the State—ordained to take cognizance of heart or conscience matter? Personally I think not. Is non-observance of Sunday a crime? If so, then the man who does business or enjoys pleasure on Sunday is a criminal. Here is where we get into trouble. A Sunday law makes a matter a crime if it be done on Sunday, that is recognized as lawful and right on the other six days of the week. It makes a man, who is recognized and looked up to as a good, law-abiding citizen through six days of the week, a criminal, because he does on Sunday just exactly as he has been doing all through the other six days, and in the doing of which he was looked up to and respected. If a matter is a crime it is a crime seven days a week and not one. You say rightly: 'There is only one way to do this thoroughly and lastingly. It is for the Church to proclaim, in its teachings, the right and proper attitude of the citizen on the Lord's Day,' but you strike right out from this position of the Church proclaiming 'in its teaching,' etc., and in your previous paragraph you suggest the use of carnal weapons to enforce the teaching of the Church. The Church is ordained of God, set in the world under God for the saving of the lost; its work is to deal only with sin, saving men from it. Civil government is set in the providence of God, to keep men civil in their relations the one with the other, and pertains only to men. Sabbath desecration or Sabbath observance is no part of man's relation to man, save only when, in the exercise of a right, an individual invades the rights of his fellows. If, as you declare, 'multitudes who formerly were regular attendants at worship, while retaining their church relationship, have become absentee members, spending the day in pleasure,' where shall we place the blame, and what remedy ought to be applied? Will you heal a man's backsliding with a Sunday law? Is this nation and the world waiting for civil enactments to stem the present flood-tide of sin? Is it not rather waiting for a church clothed with Holy Ghost power, filled with men who have a message freighted with the conviction of heaven? Let the Church arouse herself, and with a faith that with one arm will lay hold of men, and with the other will lay hold upon the throne of God, save perishing souls for the Kingdom of Christ."

Our Oregon friend, if he will read again the article he discusses, will observe that the "better way" to bring about Sabbath observance is clearly indicated as being not by a revival of "blue laws" nor by legislation, but by the Church proclaiming, in its teachings, the right and proper attitude of the citizen on the Lord's Day.

J. S. B., Omaha, Neb., writes: "Does the Bible teach that a Christian should pay his honest debts, when he can, no difference how old it is?"

The Bible teaches that a righteous man should pay his debts and owe no man anything, but to love one another (see Matt. 18:28; Rom. 13:7, 8). It also teaches that the creditor should be generous and if the debtor is poor, he should forgive him.

Rev. Arthur R. Gray, Secretary of the Protestant Episcopal Church's spiritual work in Latin America, writes us with reference to a recent article which appeared in the Christian Herald on "The Church at Panama," in which the statement was made that "The Union Church on the Canal Zone is the representative of American Protestantism at this crossroads of the New World. Four pastors serve the entire English-speaking community, including the British subjects. And the Union Church, with its limited financial resources, conducts a mission among the Panamanian aborigines and a Chinese Sunday school." Dr. Gray makes this comment: "We (the Protestant Episcopal Church) were in the Zone many years before any other non-Roman body came there, and inasmuch as we have over 1500 registered communicants, and 15,000 or 20,000 unregistered, with 950 children in our Sunday schools, and contributions from the people that approximate $7,000 a year, we feel it is unfortunate to publish a statement which would make it look as if we were obtaining support for our work under false pretences; i.e., it being implied from the statements in the Christian Herald that we were doing nothing down there."

We gladly give publicity to Dr. Gray's statement, and at the same time to assure him that we feel that no reflection could have been intended by our correspondent.

Written in a firm, bold hand, every letter fully formed and no trace of a quiver throughout, a letter comes to us from Hollywood, Calif., from a subscriber who has only been with us a year, but hopes to continue. He writes: "Ten days from today I will be 89 years old—too old to do as I would like to for you. I am a Presbyterian and go to church, but I haven't heard a word of the sermon for about four years. My ears were failing some five years ago. I read the splendid sermon published every week in the Herald and it helps me out wonderfully. Long live the Christian Herald! I have written this letter without spectacles and hope you can read it. L. L. S." It is always a pleasure to us to know that we can be helpful in any way to our aged friends.

Mrs. H. L. M., Wabash, Ind., writes: "I was just wondering how it would be for Christians to adopt a slogan. Dr. Sheldon's article on 'What Would Jesus Do?' made me think what good might be accomplished if this phrase could be placed before people everywhere. 'What Would Jesus Do?' Imagine that on a placard posted in every hotel room, every public building, every office and business house in the land. Do you not feel that it would make people think, and in so thinking, ward off the temptation to do wrong? It seems to me that if people were facing a problem, and the question would be brought to their notice, the chances are that they'd either know which way was right, or go to the Bible and find out. What do you think about it?"

H. L. M.'s suggestion is timely and practical. We believe that such a spiritual reminder, widely used, could not fail to give results. It would be the means of causing many a business program to be changed and many a wrongful act to be avoided; and it would arouse in the hearts of men and women the desire to live better, cleaner, holier and juster lives. The public conscience, as well as the individual, needs quickening and the simple, brief suggestion conveyed in the question is better calculated to meet the need than anything we know of.

Mrs. S. M. C., St. Joseph, Mo., sends this letter which may be regarded as expressing the desire of many other mothers and grandmothers for light on the same question. She writes: "I have the care of three grandchildren and want to teach them to remember the Sabbath day. They go to Sunday school and stay for the morning service. How should they spend the afternoon and evening? Their ages are eight, ten and eleven. Any suggestions will be thankfully received."

Here is an opportunity for Christian mothers who have found a way of passing the afternoon and evening hours of the Lord's Day, so that it will always be a "day of days" for the little folks, and who can tell other mothers about it in a brief letter to the Mail-Bag.

Mrs. W. H., Mylo, N. Dak. "Poor in spirit" (Matt. 5:3) is interpreted by commentators as meaning the poor, the oppressed, the afflicted, the needy, literally, "the poor of this world," yet who are rich in faith. It is meant also to express a frame of mind, independent of outward circumstances—those who have already in their hearts the seed of the Kingdom, and the sense of Divine riches that make earthly possessions seem poor in comparison.

A PLEDGE OF PEACE—THE CHRIST OF THE ANDES

On the summit of the lofty Andes Mountains, on the boundary between Argentina and Chile, stands this beautiful and majestic statue of the Christ, His left hand holding the emblem of the Cross and His right hand uplifted in blessing. The statue commemorates the peaceful settlement of a boundary dispute which had threatened to involve the two nations in war, and on the pedestal is carved an impressive pledge of perpetual peace: "These mountains will crumble to dust ere Argentines and Chileans break the peace which at the feet of Christ, the Redeemer, they have sworn to keep."

In His Steps Today What Would Jesus Do in the Home?

FOREWORD

ONE of the marvels of history is that a person who had not where to lay His head, no home of His own, and no family life except that which He enjoyed of others, is the one person in all the world who is most revered and honored in the home life of the world. At the head of the table He sits, the most honored guest in the house. In countless families, in many climes with various tongues, all down the centuries, the Christian home has been the center of the purest mother love, the source of the most intelligent and consecrated service to the State, the altar on which has burned the most fragrant incense of family worship, the inspiration to boys and girls to grow up into stalwart men and women who revere the sacred Word of God and practice its teachings in the midst of the world's excitements and temptations. History reveals no such influence over the family life as the influence of Him who had no family of His own. It is one of the many fascinating and miraculous features of the most fascinating character in all history.

SEATED about the Conference Table the following: Jesus; the Family, consisting of the Father, the Mother, the Boy, the Girl. Other figures speaking on occasion: the Grandfather, the Grandmother, the Servant.

The Father: Home is not what it used to be when I was a boy. Life was simpler and there were not so many interruptions and distractions in the way of social functions and amusements that are a large part of the times in which we now live.

The Mother: That is true. When I was a girl my main business was helping my mother about the housemaking, learning to cook and make clothes, and assist in the general duties of the home. My girl now wants to go out nearly every night to some other person's home or to some entertainment. Her clothes must be bought or made at some expensive place. She is a girl with many desires that were a stranger to my girlhood. If she goes to college she wants to do as other girls do and belong to some society where there is a good deal of entertaining, dancing, eating and going out. It is all different from my girlhood.

The Father: It's the same about my boyhood. I had to work on a farm. No movies or dances for me. Just hard work. I think I had as much fun as my boy says he has now. But I can't recall ever spending seven dollars for a society banquet or riding to college in an automobile.

The Boy: There weren't any automobiles in your time, were there, Dad?

The Father: No. And incidentally, if I had called my father "Dad" he would have had me over his knee in about less than the time it takes to spell the word.

The Boy: I did not mean any disrespect, Father. I only used the word as all the fellows use it.

The Father: I know you did. But to my mind it is only one indication out of a good many others of a careless and irreverent attitude on the part of the young people of this generation. The word reverence is not in their vocabulary.

The Grandfather: Don't you think you may be a little severe with the Boy? If I remember rightly your mother and I had to rebuke you more than once for incivility and irreverence.

The Father: I had forgotten it.

The Grandfather: One generation is apt to think that the past was better than the present. I hope you will remember that if the generation into which you were born did not have the complex troubles that go with automobiles and Greek letter societies, it had troubles perhaps more serious in the shape of saloons and slavery and public dueling and a number of other things your children do not see.

The Grandmother: Yes, that is true. I can remember when I was a girl hearing my father tell about a number of the churchwardens in his town who were helping to put the roof on the new meeting-house at a raising bee, and they were so overcome with the rum that was served out to the workers that three of them fell off the roof and broke their legs and one of them afterwards died from his injuries.

The Girl: How dreadful! Mother, you were telling us the other night of the good old times, so much better than these. Grandmother's story does not sound like it.

The Mother: I suppose we do forget some of the evil of the days when we were born. But your father and I are troubled often by the problems that face us in the home life.

The Boy and the Girl: Tell us what some of them are. Perhaps they are not so bad as you think they are.

The Father: One of the problems that face the American home is the difficulty of keeping the family together. Even in the morning we don't seem to be able to eat breakfast together. The table is set two or three times for different members of the family. Then at noon we are seldom together on account of my being downtown at my business and also on account of school hours. The evening meal finds us all at the table generally, but immediately after, the scattering begins. You young folks want to go out somewhere, either to some social function connected with your fraternity or school society or else to the movie or a party, and Mother and I have engagements somewhere, or else we spend the evening here alone. Now when I was a boy—

The Grandfather: When you were a boy you lived on a farm. Your children live in a town. The conditions are not the same.

The Mother: When I was a girl I lived in a city. But I do not recall that our home life was so broken up as it is today. I am sure that we had more family life. There were not so many parties and social events to take us away. What Father says is true of us today. Our family is not together very much.

The Boy: Do you want us to be at home every night?

The Girl: Shall we have no social life in addition to our home life?

The Father: We want you to have social enjoyment. Your Mother and I are raising the question whether it is not overdone.

The Mother: I feel quite sure it is. Take last week as a sample. Monday night was your father's club night. He ought to have some relaxation after his heavy business. We don't complain about that. I was out at a committee meeting of our woman's church society to plan for a new Sunday-school program. You children were in your rooms studying. Tuesday each of you went to a moving-picture show, while father and I stayed here. Wednesday the Boy was at a basket-ball game at the college, and the Girl was at a neighbor's visiting with a girl friend. Thursday night Father attended his lodge, and there was a football banquet to celebrate the season championship, at which, of course, both of you children had to be present, even if it did cost the sum of $2 apiece. Friday there was a dance of the fraternities and societies joining, at which, of course, you two felt bound to be present. Saturday Father had to go to a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, and there was nothing to call the rest of us out, so three members of the family were together. Sunday night—I forget what we did Sunday night—

The Father: Why, don't you remember? The Boy and Girl went to the young people's society meeting at the church, and you and I had a quiet evening at home.

The Mother: Oh, yes. So you see, the whole family was never all together any one night during the entire week.

Jesus: I would like to ask some questions. (Silence about the Table. The Servant has just come in to make an announcement, but she stands silent with all the rest.)

Jesus: I have been wondering while you were talking, if some of these problems about the American Home are being met in the right way. Do you begin the day with Family Worship?

(Silence about the Table. The Father and Mother hang their heads. The children smile. The servant looks scornful. The Grandparents look sorrowful.)

The Grandfather: I brought up my children to revere the Lord's Day and begin the day with praise and thanks to the heavenly Father and a prayer for divine wisdom and strength. The custom has disappeared from this home, I am very sorry to say.

The Father: There does not seem to be any time for it.

The Mother: The family is never together in the morning, and in the evening we are all scattered.

Jesus: Do you have as a family anything that takes the place of family worship?

(Silence again about the Table. The Father and the Mother look at each other.)

The Grandmother: Nothing can take its place. There are sometimes in this home discussions around the dinner-table over matters of conduct or ethics, but seldom anything said about religion or God. I think that the way American homes are now being run, in a short time there will be very little religious influence found in most of them. The pace is too swift, the age is too busy getting money and pleasure.

The Father: There was a good deal of cant and hypocrisy in the old custom of family worship.

Jesus: But is there not just as much now, without it?

The Grandfather: Our children could not charge that to our observance of the custom. We made it an hour of joy and spiritual refreshment. Is that not so, my son?

The Father: It is true. As I remember the morning hour, just after the morning meal, we gathered in the sitting-room and the time was filled with blessing. I would like sometimes to revive that custom. But it would be hard to do it under the present-day conditions.

Jesus: How much religious or spiritual instruction do you give your children during the week?

(The Father and the Mother look at each other in confusion and are not able to answer. Finally the Father speaks.)

The Father: We don't give any to speak of. We leave that to the church and Sunday school.

Jesus: Do you mean that you never read the Bible in the Home or teach your children out of it?

(The Father and Mother look at each other for a long time in silence.)

The Mother: We have to confess that for years we have not read the Bible out loud in the Home nor taught any thing out of it to our children.

(Note. How many average homes in the United States would have to make the same confession.)

Jesus: Do you have a Bible in the house?

The Father: I am sure we have. Mother, where is it?

The Mother: In my room I have one.

Jesus (to the Father): Do you have a Bible in your business office?

The Father: No.

Jesus: Do you know any of your business friends who do?

The Father: Yes, a few.

Jesus: You say you leave the religious training of your children to the church and Sunday school. Do either of you go to Sunday school yourselves?

The Mother: I go sometimes.

The Father: I don't go. I am too tired on Sunday morning to go.

Jesus: Do some of your business men acquaintances go?

The Father: Yes, some of them.

Jesus: Are they as busy as you are?

The Father: Yes, I suppose they are. I wonder sometimes how some of them can give so much time to church work. I really don't see how they can do it.

The Grandmother: Sunday morning in this house is distressing to me. The members of the family get up at irregular intervals and often eat at different times. Then there is a contest to see who can get the comic section of the Sunday paper and look over what seem to me to be its coarse and vulgar pictures, nearly all of which poke fun at old people and depict the tricks of children and magnify the faults of married life. That seems like a terrible way to begin the Lord's Day.

Jesus (to the Father and Mother): Are you church members?

The Mother: I am. My husband is not.

The Grandmother: How can we expect the children to grow up to be religious when the father is not interested in religious things. It is a wonder to me that they go to church or young people's meetings at all.

The Boy: Our football captain is the president of the young people's society of our church just now. He got me to go. And the meetings are not bad. I enjoy them.

The Grandfather: It looks queer to me that the religious training of this family is being given it by outsiders. The father himself should be the Priest. How can we expect a better America unless the parents are close to God and do not let the main part of the religious training of their children be turned over to strangers or even to those whom the boy looks up to in his hero worship. The Boy's best hero should be his own father.

Jesus: I would like to ask other questions. Are you parents afraid of your children?

The Father and the Mother: Afraid of them!

Jesus: If they want anything that you think is questionable in way of amusements or expense, are you afraid to say no for fear of creating antagonism? Is it easier for you to grant even questionable desires than to face a disagreeable difference with your children? Is it easier for you to let your children do what they want to do than to direct them into the best way?

The Father and the Mother (after a long and painful silence): We have probably followed the line of least resistance in matters of conduct, of amusement, and the choice of expenses and companionship. If that is what you mean by being afraid of our children, we have probably avoided making our children obey what has really been the best course in our own minds, but we have not wanted to oppose our children's wishes.

Note. In a census of very many families by the author of these articles the same confession was frankly made by at least three-fourths of the fathers and mothers tested.

Jesus: Would you give an illustration of the way in which you have granted your children's desires, even when it was contrary to your own convictions of a better course?

The Father: My Boy wanted an automobile to ride to college in. It did not seem wise to me, and I did not see how I could afford it, but he begged so hard and said that so many boys had cars that I finally gave in. The car has been a big expense, and I really ought not to have bought it, but I didn't want the Boy to think I was grouchy, and I didn't want him to get mad at me. So I let him have it. I am also frank to say that I do not approve of the young people being out so late at night with the car, but I have seldom denied the Boy that use of the car.

The Mother: My experience has been similar with the Girl. I was brought up very strictly not to dance. But when my Girl began to go to High School and afterwards to college she pleaded with me that all the other young people danced and she did not want to appear peculiar. I yielded against my better judgment, but I have never been able to bring my mind to endorse the kind of dances the young people in our college have, and the last one I saw at a meeting of one of the societies actually shocked me, it was so different from any thing I would allow myself when I was a girl.

The Child in the Temple

By MARY BRENT WHITESIDE

WHERE Herod's many-towered palace rose,
They sought the young lad Jesus who had strayed,
And where the Tyropæon valley goes
South to the outer wall; there, sore afraid
Of some disaster—some dark, nameless thing,
Joseph and Mary wandered, sorrowing.
Long did they seek Him, At the Jaffa gate
They sought, and through the streets of the bazaars,
Ablaze with Tyrian stuffs, and golden plate,
And keen Damascus blades that flashed like stars
They questioned those who had young doves to sell
About the temple's outer courts, and told
The little halting tale they had to tell
To money changers, counting evil gold.

He stood among the doctors, straight and slim,
As a young cedar upon Lebanon;
A star-eyed presence, and they bent on Him,
Bleared visages of wonder. Solomon
Had not such wisdom in his tender youth;
David, such visionings as this, of truth.
He had but wandered back from Olivet
Into the city, for a voice did call—
A glory and a dream that held Him yet,
And so He had turned backward; that was all.
But Mary watching, saw the radiance fade
Out of that face she loved so tenderly,
When He told how, beneath an olive's shade,
He saw an angel in Gethsemane.

The Grandmother: And yet even after that, you never restricted the Girl in the matter of the dances, and made no objections to her going to social gatherings that lasted very late and interfered with her studies.

The Mother: We did talk it over, but she said that all the girls in her society did the same and she did not want to appear odd or queer.

The Servant: I came in to say that I have found a place in a store where I am going to work, and I won't be able to work in this family any longer.

The Father: Another one of the problems of the American Home! What are we going to do now?

The Mother: We can do what so many of our neighbors are doing, move into an apartment house.

The Father: Yes, or a hotel. And then, good-bye to home, sweet home. Speaking to the servant, I suppose the store can pay better wages than we are able to afford. But, really, ten dollars a week and board and washing seems reasonable for our family.

The Servant: The store will pay me three times as much.

The Mother: But out of your pay you will have to meet the expense of your room and board.

The Servant: I am making a change for other reasons. I don't like housework. It is too confining and monotonous. I am looked down upon as a servant. I want a different kind of life. I am going into the store. (She goes out.)

The Father: Now then, Mother, what are we going to do?

The Mother: What thousands of other American homes are doing. Get along without help in the housework.

The Grandmother and Grandfather: We would like to be of more use, but we are getting old and are more or less of a burden.

The Mother: I am not very well myself. But I will do all I can.

The Father: We face a real problem.

Jesus: It is not insoluble. There are happy and useful homes in your neighborhood where the same conditions can be found. In a home where the vision of real father-and-mother love and duty and kindness and love of honest work and sharing of burdens is a daily vision, even the problem of the daily drudgery of getting necessary meals and keeping the home pleasant is not without an answer.

The Boy to the Girl: I wonder if that means that we can do what we have never been willing to do in helping Mother about the house.

The Mother: I will sacrifice anything rather than live like so many of our acquaintances in a hotel.

The Father: Heaven deliver me from a hotel life! There isn't a spot on earth more dear to me than my home.

The Grandfather: Even if you are out of it so much!

Father: That makes no difference. There is no place like it, is there, Mother?

The Mother: We have been careless about its sacred duties and privileges. But when we once face the question of being compelled to give them up we begin to know what the home has really meant to us. There is no such place on earth. Let us all help to maintain it.

The Father: I can do more than I ever did. I can think of many times when I could have helped Mother when I selfishly chose my own ease and let her bear the burden of drudgery.

The Boy: I'll do more to help.

The Girl: And so will I.

The Father: They are not half bad, our children, after all. I always said that an American home had in it something stable and enduring and could not be broken up, not even by problems.

Jesus: But may I remind this American home of some real truths that alone will keep the home as the center of the nation's power and influence? (All are silent as the Master speaks solemnly and lovingly.)

You, Father and Mother, need to love and serve the heavenly Father. The one greatest need in this home is not the need of hired hands to prepare food and do the drudgery, but the greatest need is a unity of affection among the members of the family that is based on a religious faith that has its roots down deep in a love of God. There are families in this neighborhood that face far greater problems than you face, problems of poverty and struggle and sickness, and yet the joy of heaven is in those homes and the very gate of heaven opens to the visitor whenever he steps across the threshold.

Cease to fear your children. The greatest kindness you can show them is to teach them to obey the truth of life. They will thank you for it when they grow up if you did not let them do everything they wanted to do, simply because others did it.

Put the Bible and the Family Altar back into the honored place they once held. On that basis the true home in this land must be built. Without it all the wealth and luxury and things in the house will not be worth anything.

Let every member do his share to bear the burdens as he shares in the privilege of the home. There can be no happy homes where any members of the family selfishly let others bear more than their part of the work to make the home what it ought to be.

But the one great thing is love to one another and to the good God. Where that burns on the altar of the heart all things are easy, all tasks light. I leave you my benediction. Peace be to this home. The peace of God. Love ye one another.

Jesus rises and quietly passes out. The Family remain as before, only there is a different spirit.)

The Father: I wonder how it is that His presence here in our home has seemed to give it a sacred meaning. I never felt it before.

The Mother: Even when He silently rebuked our godlessness and our blunders in home-making, my heart burned in me to merit and keep His blessing.

The Boy: I wish He would stay with us always.

The Girl: He made me feel how selfish and unworthy of a beautiful home I have always been.

The Grandmother: I bless the memory of His presence.

The Grandfather: We will pray for the Master's presence to abide with our children and theirs, always.

The Father: We will give Him the honored place at the head of our table from this time over.

The Mother: And not omit any more as we have done so long, the asking of the Grace which we have so sadly neglected.

(The Family remain seated about the Table, gazing at the place where the Master had been. And each one seems to hear the others say in their hearts: "If He shall sit there in our Home at the head of our table, all problems will be solved and all hearts will be pure. And the American home will be what we pray it may be, the sweetest place on earth, because it is the place where love reigns, and service rules, and God abides.")

IT IS estimated, on the basis of a questionnaire study made by the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor, that 175,000 children were brought before courts in the United States in a year. Of these, 50,000 came before courts not adapted to handling children's cases.

Although every state except one had laws providing for juvenile probation, fewer than half the courts hearing children's cases actually had probation service. The majority of the courts failed to make adequate investigation of the child's home and family circumstances, his physical and mental condition, and his personal tendencies. Especially in small towns and rural districts the child is still subjected to the unsocialized treatment which the juvenile court was designed to replace.

However, facilities for mental and physical examinations are being extended. Co-operation between the courts and other social agencies has been increasing, and in some instances social agencies have given the services of trained social workers for probation work. A further development is indicated in the tendency to merge the cases of children with those of their families, and to try them before "family" or "domestic relations" courts. In this way the child is dealt with as a member of his family, and all the family circumstances are taken into account.

CHAPTER XIV

AS ROSE-MARIE left the Volsky flat—Ella had begged her to go; had assured her that it would be better to leave Mrs. Volsky to her inarticulate grief—her brain was in a whirl. Things had happened in the last few hours with a kaleidoscopic rapidity; the whirl of events had left her mind in a dazed condition.

She told herself, over and over, that Ella was saved. But she found it hard to believe that Ella would ever find happiness, despite her salvation, in the grim tenement that made her home. She told herself that Bennie was learning to travel the right road, that the Scout Club would be the means of leading him to other clubs, and that the other clubs would, in time, introduce him to Sunday school and to the church. She told herself that Mrs. Volsky was willing to try; very willing to try! But of what avail would be Bennie's budding faith and idealism if he had to come, night after night, to the home that was responsible for men like Jim—and like Pa?

Pa! Rose-Marie realized with a new sense of shock that Pa was no longer a force to reckon with. Pa was dead—had been crushed by a truck. He never again would slouch drunkenly into the flat, he never again would throw soiled clothing and broken bottles and heavy shoes into newly tidied corners. He was dead and he had—after all—been the one link that tied the Volskys to their dingy quarters! With Pa gone the family could seek cleaner, sweeter rooms—rooms that would have been barred to the family of a drunkard! With Pa gone the air would clear, magically, of some of its heaviness.

Rose-Marie, telling herself how much the death of Pa was going to benefit the Volsky family, felt all at once heartless. She had been brought up in an atmosphere where death carries sorrow with it—deep sorrow and sanctity. She remembered the dim parlors of the little town when there was a funeral; she remembered the singing of the village choir and the voice of the pastor, slightly unsteady, perhaps, but very confident of the life hereafter. She remembered the flowers, and the mourners in their black gowns, and the pure tears of grief. She had always seen folk meet death so—meet it rather beautifully.

BUT the passing of Pa! She shuddered to think of its cold cruelty—it was rather like his life. He had been snuffed out—that was all—snuffed out! There would be for him no dim parlor, no singing choir, no pastor with an unsteady voice. The black-robed mourners would be absent, and so would the flowers. His going would cause not a ripple in the life of the community; it would bring with it better opportunities for his family, rather than a burden of sorrow!

"I can't grieve for him!" Rose-Marie told herself desperately; "I can't grieve for him! It's the only chance he ever gave to his children—dying! Perhaps, without him, they'll be able to make good. . . ."

She was crossing the park—splashed with sunshine, it was. And suddenly she remembered the first time that she had met Bennie in the park. It seemed centuries away, that first meeting! She remembered how she had been afraid, then, of the crowds. Now she walked through them with a certain assurance—she belonged. She had come a long distance since that first meeting with Bennie—a very long distance! She told herself that she had proved her ability to cope with circumstance—had proved her worth, almost. Why, now, should the Superintendent keep her always in the shadow of the Settlement House—why should the Young Doctor laugh at her desire to help people? She had something to show them—she could flaunt Bennie before their eyes, she could quote the case of Ella; she could produce Mrs. Volsky, broken of spirit but ready to do anything that she could. And—last but not least—she would show Lily to them, Lily who had been hidden away from the eyes of the ones who could help her—Lily who so desperately needed help!

All at once Rose-Marie was weary of deceit. She would be glad—ever so glad—to tell her story to the Superintendent! She was tired of going out furtively of an afternoon to help these folk that she had come to help. She wanted to go in an open way, with the stamp of approval upon her. The Superintendent had said once that she would hardly be convincing to the people of the slums. With the Volsky family to show she could prove that she had been convincing, very convincing!

With a singing heart she approached the Settlement House. With a smile on her lips she went up the brownstone steps, pushed wide the door—which was never locked. And then she hurried, as fast as her feet could hurry, to the Superintendent's tiny office.

The Superintendent was in. She answered Rose-Marie's knock with a cheery word but, when the girl entered the room, she saw that the Superintendent's kind eyes were troubled.

"What's the matter?" she questioned, forgetting, for a moment, the business that she had been so full of; "what's the matter? You look ever so worried!"

The Superintendent's tired face broke into a smile.

"Was I looking as woe-begone as that?" she queried. "I didn't realize that I was. Nothing serious is the matter, dear—nothing very serious! Only Katie's sister in the old country is ill—and Katie is going home to stay with her. And it's just about impossible to get a good maid, nowadays—it seems as if Katie has been with me for a lifetime. I expect that we'll manage, somehow, but I don't just fancy cooking and sweeping, and running the Settlement House, too!"

All at once an idea leaped, full-blown, into the brain of Rose-Marie. She leaned forward and laid her hand upon the Superintendent's arm.

"I wonder," she asked excitedly, "if you'd consider a woman with a family to take Katie's place? The family isn't large—just a small boy, who goes to school, and a small girl, and an older girl, who is working. There's a grown son, but he can take care of himself. . . . the last she said almost under her breath. "He can take care of himself. It would be better, for them—"

The Superintendent was eying Rose-Marie curiously.

"We have plenty of sleeping-rooms on the top floor," she said slowly, "and I suppose that the older girl could help a bit evenings. Why, yes, perhaps a family might solve the problem—it's easier to keep a woman with children than one who is," she laughed, "heart-whole and fancy free! Who are they, dear, and how do you happen to know of them?"

ROSE-MARIE sat down, suddenly, in a chair beside the Superintendent's desk. All at once her knees were shaky—all at once she felt strangely apprehensive.

"Once," she began, and her voice quivered slightly, "I met a little boy in the park. He was hurting a kitten. I started to scold him and then something made me question him, instead. And I found out that he was hurting the kitten because he didn't know any better—think of it, because he didn't know any better! And so I was interested, ever so interested. And I decided it was my duty to know something of him—to find out what sort of an environment was responsible for him."

For Rose-Marie, her face hidden in the crook of her elbow, was crying like a very tired child

The Superintendent's tired face was alight. She leaned forward to ask a question.

"How long ago," she questioned, "did you meet this child in the park?"

Rose-Marie flushed. The time, suddenly, seemed very long to her.

"It was the day that I came home, bringing a little gray cat with me," she said, "It was the day that I quarreled with Dr. Blanchard at the luncheon-table. Do you remember?"

The Superintendent smiled reminiscently. "Ah, yes, I remember!" she said. And then—"Go on with the story, dear."

Rose-Marie went on.

"I found the place where he lived," she said hurriedly. "Yes—I know that you wouldn't have let me go if you'd known about it! That's why I didn't tell you. I found the place where he lived; an unspeakable tenement on an unspeakable street. And I met, there, his family—a most remarkable family! There was a mother, and an older sister, and an older brother, and a drunken father, and a little crippled girl. . . ."

AND then, shaking inwardly, Rose-Marie told the story of the Volskys. She told it well; better than she realized. For the Superintendent's eyes never left her face and, at certain parts of the story, the Superintendent's cheeks grew girlishly pink. She told of the saving of Ella, she told of Bennie, explaining that he was the same child whom the Young Doctor had met in the hall. She told of Mrs. Volsky's effort to better herself, and of Jim's snake-like smoothness. And then she told of Lily—Lily with her almost unearthly beauty and her piteous physical condition. As she told of Lily the Superintendent's kind eyes filled with tears, and her lips quivered.

"Oh," she breathed, "if only something could be

THE Christian Herald today presents to its readers an opportunity for service which will gladden many hearts. In past years, they have been the special patrons of thousands of children in India and China, of hundreds in Japan, and of a number in Africa. The story of their kindness to those waifs—a very large majority of whom are now trained and self-supporting Christian men and women—forms one of the brightest records of missionary effort in any land. Now, the way is open to them to become the godfathers or godmothers of little orphan waifs in Jerusalem, the land which of all the world holds the most sacred memories of childhood.

There are some thirty-six of these little folks in the Christian Herald Orphanage in Jerusalem—all girls—in whose behalf we appeal to your love and sympathy. We want to see them enrolled as the personal protégés of kindly American patrons. Before entering on the recital of their pitiful life-stories—each a tale of suffering which awakens wonder that such things could ever happen in the Christ-land—let us here state how they came to be rescued.

When the World War broke out, Palestine became an armed camp. By and by the circle of iron and steel closed around the Holy City on all sides. For nearly four years Jerusalem was cut off from all communication with the outside world. Then came want and suffering to thousands who had no means of escape. Fathers and brothers were taken for the war, and the breadwinners of hundreds of families were killed, leaving widows and orphans to face an utterly hopeless battle. In those trying days the American Colony threw its doors open as a refuge for the helpless. It established soup-kitchens and other enterprises and did a most helpful work, in which the readers of this magazine had an opportunity, before the city was completely shut off, to render considerable service by their contributions. During those years of isolation, the Orphanage and the other humanitarian efforts of the Colony were the mainstay of the city's poor. And when the day of capitulation dawned, and the Turks yielded the city to General Allenby, the glorious news came over the cable telling how, under Divine protection, the work which many thought must have perished had been kept alive and active, and had made a record that will never be forgotten.

MRS. BERTHA SPAFFORD VESTER of the American Colony, founder of the Orphanage, has been in correspondence with the Christian Herald regarding the provision of support for the orphans under her care. She has the active co-operation of her Colony associates in the orphanage work and all are rendering excellent service voluntarily. She writes:

"Dr. Glazebrooke, our American Consul, was very much impressed with the good work we were doing at the Orphanage. I am sure you would be very proud of it, if you could step inside and see it. I hear it repeatedly said that it is the best-conducted institution in Jerusalem. I have sent photographs and biographies of the children. During the two hottest summer months, we dispersed most of the children, to reduce expenses to the minimum. One after another came to the Colony to be fed.

Little Orphans

A Wonderful Opportunity

It was too sad for words to see some of them roam the streets hungry and ragged. At last we gathered them into the Orphanage."

The Christian Herald Orphanage has been officially commended by high civil and military authorities for the splendid service it is rendering to the helpless poor in Jerusalem. Copies of these letters of appreciation have been sent to the Christian Herald.

Here is an opportunity for Sunday-school classes, Epworth Leagues, Christian Endeavor branches, Baptist Young People's organizations, Ladies' Aid Societies and kindred bodies to take up the support of a Palestine orphan. Their little protégé will be trained and taught to write to her benefactors at regular intervals, and the latter will thus be put in personal communication with the children of their adoption. Individual members, too, will be welcomed as patrons. There could be no finer opportunity for getting into personal touch with a little Jerusalem child and influencing her whole future life.

This is a kind of missionary work that lies closer to the heart than any other, because it links the patron to the protégé in a union that grows more and more interesting every year. The cost of support, which includes shelter, clothing, tuition and food, is estimated at $130.00 a year—equal to $2.50 a week or about 35 cents a day. This, in view of the importance of the work and the great results to be attained, is a very modest figure, and one which can not be considered burdensome.

On this and the following page the portraits of the children sent by Mrs. Vester are reproduced. We would urge that all of our friends who are interested should make up their minds as quickly as possible, and write us indicating their choice. It will be well for those desiring to become patrons to act promptly in notifying the Christian Herald. All notifications should indicate the child chosen, giving the number and name. In the event of several applicants for the same child, the application first received will have preference. Address all applications to Jerusalem Orphan Work, care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

1. Evelina Izrak is nine years old and Greek Orthodox. Her father was killed in the war; her mother, Leah, unskilled and working at odd jobs, has another child to support. Evelina since coming to the Christian Herald Jerusalem Orphanage has developed into a robust and happy child, sunny in temper and giving great promise.

2. Khadegie Imwaked, aged eleven, is of Mohammedan parents, both dead. The family was well-to-do but was reduced by the war. Khadegie is an exceedingly bright child, fond of her lessons, and progressing both in health and character.

3. Marie Aboud, eight, is a little maid of the Greek Orthodox Church. Her father George Aboud, is paralyzed from shell-shock, and her mother, Wady, is dead.

Marie's family came from the mountains of Ajalon in northeastern Palestine. Some Moslems wanted to take Marie from her helpless father by force, which meant to make her somebody's concubine. To avoid this he sent her to Jerusalem to a distant relative of her mother's. This person is very poor and unable to feed her own family of three children. Marie is stunted and thin, but bright and lovable.

4. Fareedy Elias, a nine-year-old Syrian, is a waif. Her father, George Elias, deserted his family seven years ago and went to South America. Sadie, the mother, supports herself and a younger child by serving. It was quite impossible for her to support the two. The family came originally from Mesopotamia.

5. Milly Halaby is twelve, Greek Orthodox by faith and a half-orphan, her father, George Halaby, being dead. Her mother, Wacselie, is able to work only at odd times, and has one younger child. The mother has been supported by the American Colony for years.

6. Asma Najla Aish, aged six, is a little Protestant girl. Her father, Salama Aish, is blind. Her mother, Hannie, died of tuberculosis. Asma is partly crippled. The family is exceedingly poor. She was very sad and never smiled, but now she is beaming with happiness. She was threatened with tuberculosis, but shows no signs of it now.

7. Katrina Hishy is a little four-year-old, whose father, Nachlie, was killed in the war. Her mother, Julia, belongs to a good family, but was left destitute and has a younger son to support. She works as servant. Little Katrina, since she came to the Orphanage, has changed completely. She is happy and robust now.

8. Erfat Ersas, aged twelve, is a little motherless Mohammedan, whose father, Hafiz Ersas, was impoverished by the war.

9. Waheebie Ersas is the thirteen-year-old sister of No. 8. After their mother's death they were sadly neglected, but now they are looking well and happy.

10. Lydia Farrah, aged fourteen, is a Greek Orthodox maid, whose father, Moussa Farrah, was killed in the war. The mother, Katingo, has two small boys to support. Lydia was rescued from degrading surroundings. She is a pretty, attractive girl and takes keen pleasure in the advantages of the Orphanage.

11. Aishey Abdul Azeez is five years old, and a Mohammedan. After her father, Abdul Azeez, son of Hadj Saleem from Anatolia in Asia Minor, was killed in the war, her mother, Alameye, married again and left Jerusalem, deserting Aishey to roam the streets. A Moslem acquaintance of the American Colony brought her to the Orphanage. She is a dear, sweet child, with winning manners. She has been very susceptible to the training in the Orphanage and has improved almost beyond recognition.

12. Guldusta Bada, aged ten, is a Mohammedan girl. Both parents died when

for Service Is Offered

she was quite small. She was taken care of by a Mohammedan family, who were so reduced financially by the war that they were unable to care for her any longer. Guldusta is pretty and was asked for in marriage. The American Colony prevented this and will insist on retaining her until she is of marriageable age.

13. Khadigie Ersas is eight years old, and a Mohammedan. Her father, Ruside Ersas, is dead. Her mother, Rabaa, came from Hebron, and was left absolutely destitute by the death of her husband, with two younger boys to care for. She is quite helpless, like the majority of Moslem women of her class, and relies entirely on charity for support. This tiny child of eight, Khadigie, was to be dragged away and married when the Orphanage rescued her.

14. Zulfa Ersas is six years old and is a Mohammedan. She is a sister of Khadigie (No. 13). Zulfa is a very bright, attractive child.

15. Naheel Katooha is eight years old and Greek Orthodox. Her father, Elia Katooha, is dead. Her mother, Marie, is living. This was a respectable family with five girls, no boys. The late war has reduced them to the lowest pinch of poverty. The American Colony helped them at the time the Christian Herald sent funds in 1915 to open the lace industry. Naheel was very ill, from malnutrition; but since she came to the Orphanage, where she gets good food, she has improved wonderfully.

16. Rafeha el Yousef is eight years old, and Greek Orthodox. Her father, Yousef el Yousef, is old and helpless and her mother, Lateefie, is dead. Rafeha's history would have been a sad one had not the Orphanage opened its doors to her.

17. Salfetie is ten years old and Greek Orthodox. Her father, Elias Salfetie, is dead and her mother, Helanie, is semi-invalid. This family is respectable but reduced in circumstances by the war. The mother has no means of support, and her poor health prevents her working. There was nothing for such a child but to roam the streets and learn all kinds of wickedness had not the Orphanage opened its loving gates.

18. Widad Kattan is seven and is Greek Orthodox. Her father, Hannah Kattan, is dead. Her mother, Marie, is still living.

19. Eda Kattan, sister of No. 18, is ten years old. This poor widow ought to be in good circumstances, but the relatives have swallowed all the property. Marie supports herself by working as a nurse for children. It is a pathetic case. Little Eda was suffering from malnutrition when she was taken into the Orphanage but is better now.

20. Mary Elias, age eight, is a Protestant child. Her father, Nasrie Elias, was a school-teacher of the Church Missionary Society in Gaza, but was deported with his family to the east of the Jordan by the Turks, because he had worked for English people. In Ez-Salt, the family suffered privation and sickness. Finally the mother died. After the British occupation, Nasrie Elias came back to Jerusalem with his three daughters in a sad state of poverty. Lack of food and privation had so undermined his health that he found himself unable to support his children. His three daughters are in the Orphanage. They are nice, bright girls.

21. Julia Elias, age nine, is a sister of No. 20.

22. Nellie Elias, age twelve, is another sister of No. 20.

23. Zaheye Fallace, age six, is Greek Orthodox. Her father, Jameal Fallace, died in a hospital from privations endured in the Turkish Labor Corps in the war. Her mother, Jamelie, is an invalid as a result of typhus fever and slow starvation. She has no means of support. When Zaheye came to the Christian Herald Jerusalem Orphanage she looked more like an animal than a human being and her appetite was insatiable. Now she is a normal child full of fun and mischief.

24. Faruze Saallah, age five, is a Mohammedan. Her father, Abed Saallah, died from nephritis caused by lack of food and exposure in the Turkish Labor Corps. Her mother, Nazerie, has two boys to support, one an epileptic and helpless.

25. Fatme Saallah, age seven, is a Mohammedan girl, sister to No. 24.

26. Julie Imsarsa, age nine, is a Greek Orthodox child. Her father, Ustandie

Imsarsa, died of typhus fever in the war. Her mother, Magdel, is a sewing woman. They were well off, but the war reduced them to the lowest state of poverty. Magdel has one other child to support.

27. Marika Pooligo, age thirteen, is Greek Orthodox. Her father, Aneia Pooligo, is dead and so also is her mother, Olympia. Marika was roaming the streets and doubtless would have gone to the "bad" had not a friend of the American Colony brought her to the Orphanage. The family came from Greece as pilgrims, and the war prevented their return.

28. Ecrevy Moussa, age ten, is Greek Orthodox. Her father, Saleem Moussa, is an invalid. Her mother, Desbina, is dead. This family used to be well off. Ecrevy is very delicate. Her eyesight is defective and she is under treatment.

29. Margaret Anastas, age eight, is Greek Orthodox. Her father, George Anastas, died of snake bite. Her mother, Aristo, died soon after her husband, leaving two sisters, ten and twelve years old, to be provided for. Margaret and her sister Alice came to the Orphanage in a pitiable condition.

30. Alice Anastas, age five, sister to No. 29.

31. Khadigie Rifka Goshie, age eight, is a Mohammedan. Her father, Moussa Goshie, died of typhus fever in the war. Her mother is Hudda Goshie. Hudda's family and that of her husband were prosperous before the war. Hudda has six children. Two daughters were admitted to the Orphanage. They were the most pitiful specimens of the ravages of the war that came to the refuge. Last February, when Jerusalem lay under thirty-two inches of snow, Hudda was found in her home in an indescribable state of misery and another girl, Janeelie, was taken into the Orphanage. Rifka is a pretty child and good at her lessons.

32. Julia Adelle Muhdah, age 9, is Greek Orthodox. Her father, Jad Muhdah, was killed in the war. Her mother, Burbara, is a confirmed invalid, caused by privations and lack of care during confinement. She has three other children to support besides Julia and Helanie. Julia Adelle is a bright child, with a happy disposition and very persevering in her studies.

33. Helanie Muhdah, aged six, is sister to Julia, No. 32.

34. Fatoume Goshie, aged ten, is a Mohammedan child, sister to No. 31. Fatoume is a sweet girl with winning way.

35. Jameelie Goshie, aged five, is also sister to Rifka Goshie, No. 31. Jameelie is a dear child, clinging and affectionate.

36. Asma Wahbie, aged ten, is a Mohammedan. Her father, Abdulkader Wahbie, is dead, also her mother, Sadika. During the Relief work, the American Colony fed the grandmother and Asma. After the British occupation, the grandmother died, and Asma was left without any one to care for her. This child has trachoma and a cataract on one eye. She is receiving medical treatment, and will be cured in time.

Scars

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

*WHEN Jesus blessed the children long ago,
And held them in His arms, and soothed away
Their little fears, and watched them at their play,
I wonder if His wistful soul could know
That other children, like to them, would grow
Like flowers, in the self-same land; that they Would have no Friend to bless their cheerless day—
That they, too young, would drink life's cup of woe!*

*I wonder if He knew. . . I think that He Could not have smiled so brightly if He had!
Christ's kind heart bleeds when little ones are sad,
When children cry He tastes of misery.
And, oh, the orphans in His land, today,
Hurt Him like scars that will not heal away!*

A Simple Inauguration

IN DISAPPROVING of the plans for an elaborate and costly inauguration program, President-elect Harding has stood by his guns as an advocate of Jeffersonian simplicity. He will have no expensive display, and prefers that the ceremony should take place in the Capitol itself, possibly on the spacious east porch, without a single extra preparation being made for the occasion. Even the parade, in late years a brilliant spectacle, will be shortened, and the escort limited. There will be no big reviewing stand and—no inaugural ball!

This attitude is in line with the simplicity observed by the founders of the Republic. Emphasized at this time, let us hope that it may be a practical lesson in thrift and economy, as opposed to the love of ostentatious display for its own sake. We have reached a time when economy is an imperative duty in national as well as in business and individual affairs.

In taking this wholesome step, Mr. Harding does not detract from the importance of the event. He dignifies it and invests it with a significance which no glittering pageant with its lavish display could possibly confer.

Right and Wrong History

HISTORY, as it has been made, is often a curious mixture of personal bias and prejudice. The impossibility of getting an altogether impartial view of an event or of a great personality is so great that many historians nowadays are ready to agree with H. G. Wells that the one necessity of civilization is a common historical meeting-ground of ideas. Until the human race has common historical ideas it cannot have universal peace or prosperity. And it cannot have common historical ideas as long as so many different ideas are held by the people who get their ideas at second hand from the printed page of books or the imperfect judgments of superficial observers of historical events.

We were taught to believe when we were boys that Frederick the Great and Napoleon were great men and statesmen. As the historian now pictures these men, we find that when the news about them is truthfully told they were without conscience when it came to appropriating other people's property, and utterly unscrupulous about taking it away from them. Mr. Wells in his great work, "The Outline of History," says of Napoleon: "He was a scoundrel, bright and complete. Most of us are constrained more or less to serve God and our fellow men, to do things disinterestedly, to behave decently when no one is watching us. Napoleon was not so constrained." Of Caesar he says: "He was an immoral and attitude-inizing old Roman who has been magnified and dressed up for the admiration of careless and uncritical readers." Of Mohammed he says: "He was vain, egotistical, tyrannous, and a self-deceiver."

All of which is disquieting to our complacent acceptance of things currently regarded as facts. It is not pleasant to have our old school histories discredited. But on the other hand, it is better to have the truth about men and events, than to go on believing agreeable falsehoods.

The Laymen's Call to Prayer

ORDINARILY, the summons to prayer in great national emergencies is issued by the churches. A new precedent has been set by such a call coming from a representative body of forty-one distinguished laymen in twenty states, representing practically all of the denominations. The message is an invitation.

"To men and women of all faiths, who believe in an Omnipotent God and in the power of prayer, to join us in a common, concerted and continuous exercise of intercession, to the end that humanity everywhere, torn as it is by dissension, and suffering many kinds of ill effects of the world-war, may turn to the patient Father in Heaven for new motives and guidance and succor. Our world will never get right with itself until it gets right with God. Only spiritual remedies can cure the present ills of mankind. Therefore, we call upon all who believe that the Living God hears and answers prayer, to offer daily petitions in behalf of our troubled world—with all its international strife and jealousies and self-seeking; with its industrial unrest, its social unrest, its political unrest—that the Lord Almighty may suffuse the hearts of all people everywhere with a consuming desire to seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness. Then all other things needful may be added unto us, as promised by our Lord Jesus Christ."

The call further adds: "We crave for ourselves and for our time a revival of the sense of the reality of God, and of our dependence upon Him, and of a spirit of loyalty to Him."

In order that all sincere believers may unite in this general supplication, they are urged to engage "privately or publicly in daily prayer, that the very gravity of present world conditions may drive us all to the Eternal God Who is our refuge, and Who is the only Light in our darkness. In Him we shall find peace, good-will and power for the task of remaking the world."

The Christian Herald and its readers believe in the efficacy of prayer. In their churches and home gatherings, and in their Prayer League, whose thousands of members are scattered throughout this land, they are now earnestly invited to present, not once, but many times, their petition set forth in the message of the laymen. There is no other way to find a cure for present troubles than by submitting them before the throne of God, in the full assurance that "all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." And may He who hears and answers the earnest prayer of believing hearts send such a spiritual awakening as will arouse this nation and inspire it with new life. Soul-quickenings, we shall then begin to realize the blessings for which we have so long hoped for—peace among ourselves, with good-will toward all men—friends, neighbors and even our former enemies—and with grace to serve God and give Him the glory due to His name.

It is only by submission to the Divine will and the placing of ourselves in His hands, sincerely repenting of our sins and accepting Him as our Guide in all things, that we can hope to attain to those blessings which, as a nation, we so greatly need.

Causes of Crime

WHAT are they?

The mayor of the greatest city in this Republic has issued a proclamation advising the citizens to go armed for protection from thieves. A "crime wave" is spreading over the country. And vigilance committees are being formed, as in the old California days and the old frontier times.

Some say the crime wave is due to post-war conditions. That restless minds and the beginning of unemployment are beginning to make men desperate. Others say that the crime wave is no more than it has always been, but that it is being exploited by the press for political and other reasons.

Some give one reason and some another for the cause of the prevalent crime. No one denies the facts of alarming disturbance, especially in the big cities. No one can well deny it when the mayor of our largest and most proud metropolis asks citizens to arm themselves or their messengers for their own protection from assault and robbery.

But how would these reasons strike you as the causes of crime in the United States at the present time?

The first reason is the absurd and wicked definition that the people in cities like New York and Chicago and Denver and San Francisco have always had of a police system. The present definition of police protection in our cities is fundamentally wrong. Police for cities should be missionaries, highly educated, well paid, and they should be chosen with as much care as we choose our best young men and women to go as missionaries to foreign lands. A police force chosen on the principle of preventing crime and educating the people would save New York millions of dollars every year. You don't believe this, but I do, and that is the reason I am saying it.

In the second place, the homes of America are to blame for not training their children to be good citizens. When thousands of families in this country spend more time in learning the newest dances and going to places of amusement and eating expensive banquets than they ever spend in studying the Bible or instructing their children in the ways of good living we may expect to see society on the edge of the volcano. And when the rich profiteers go unpunished by the Government or the State, it is no wonder that the citizen who wants to break into a jewelry store or hold up a merchant between Broadway and Fifth Avenue at noon feels as if his business would not suffer in comparison with his friend the profiteer, who may possibly live somewhere in the neighborhood.

But in the third place, how would it do for this country to begin to study the Ten Commandments? And how would it do for those ministers who have been preaching on topics of the day to turn their attention to the Gospel and say something about the Sermon on the Mount! That might stop some of the crime, at least that is what such preaching in the past has done.

And how about teaching some Bible truths in the public schools? Would any one be hurt by it except the criminals? We leave that question with you. But it looks to me as if the cause of crime was what it always has been—the throwing of the Ten Commandments on the scrap heap by the State, the Church and the Home. CHARLES M. SHELDON.

The Reason Why

PEOPLE want to know why the farmers are making such a "fuss," as they call it. The city people, many of whom have no knowledge of country affairs, and do not reckon on any thing much above their own skyscrapers, read the accounts in the papers about the farmers' grievances and wonder vaguely what is the matter. They have heard of the great prosperity of the farmer, of the big prices for wheat and corn and potatoes and they do not understand the real trouble as it exists at the present, a trouble which if not met in the right way will result in serious conditions for all the people. For in the last analysis, all the people are dependent on the agricultural section for the very breath of life.

Here are some reasons why the farmer is voicing his complaint at present:

With transportation gone up from 33 and 1/4 per cent. to 100 per cent., and the prices of all necessities like shoes, coal, gasoline, and machinery advanced to almost prohibitive prices the farmer faces a market in which corn is down to 30 or 40 cents, $10 for hogs, $7 for cattle, 11 cents for cotton, and he must pay 10 cents a bushel to get his corn husked, $18 a ton for coal that a year ago was only $14, $10 for a hat, and $12 for a pair of shoes, although he gets only 65 cents for the hide out of which the shoes are made.

There is a story going the rounds in a western state of a farmer who sent a car load of sheep to a city market and when the bill of lading for transportation of the car load was sent him, the charges were a little over the price the dealer paid for the sheep and the farmer was confronted with a bill to pay the buyer of the sheep. The farmer thereupon wrote to the buyer that he did not have any money, but if it was all right with the buyer he would send him some more sheep to balance the account!

Farming is the United States' largest industry, producing every year over $20,000,000,000 of new wealth. Agriculture produces one-half the fund which supports the nation's population. Forty-five per cent. of the entire population of this country is agricultural. In other words, nearly one-half of the population is dependent on agricultural prosperity. The farmer is the keystone of the arch of this nation's commercial prosperity. If he fails, the railroads cannot run, cities cannot exist, factories would close, the entire industrial world would come to a dead stop.

The situation at the present time is so critical that Congress is taking special measures through investigation and consultation with experts to determine the right measures to maintain the highest efficiency of agricultural power. When we once understand that we are all dependent on the farmer for existence, it seems like the greatest stupidity to continue to neglect the very source of national prosperity and life itself.

Words of Cheer

To the Christian Herald:

Last night my mother opened her Christian Herald, saying: "For me my Christian Herald is next to the Bible," and sat down to her weekly feast. H.D.
Carlisle, Ky.

To the Christian Herald:

We would not know how to keep house without the Christian Herald. We have taken it for a good many years. We take a number of other papers, but none of them gives us the joy and satisfaction that this Christian magazine gives. If we depended on some of the secular papers for spiritual food, our souls would starve to death. It is a great relief, after running through the lists of prize fights, murders, suicides and hold-ups in the daily paper, to pick up a copy of your paper and find that the world has not all gone to the bad and that there is a work for everyone to do to bring about a reformation. Our prayer is that the Christian Herald may continue to be of great good to suffering humanity. A. R. F.

French Cabinet Is Overthrown on Germany Indemnity Issue

FRANCE'S demand for a stronger policy toward Germany, which already had been severe enough to arouse the apprehensions of others of the Allies, has resulted in the overthrow of Premier Leygues' cabinet, by a vote of 463 to 125, in the Chamber of Deputies. The Deputies believed the Premier had not been firm enough in his negotiations regarding the German indemnity and feared that if he conducted the important negotiations which are to be held before May 1, Germany would get off too easily. The vote came on the second day of the new session, after the members of Parliament had been at their homes for some time and had had an opportunity of ascertaining the views of their constituencies.

With the French Finance Ministry carrying a deficit of 35,000,000,000 paper francs and with the deficit steadily mounting, the taxpayers were demanding that Germany be forced to make payments on the indemnity account; but Premier Leygues, in his three months in office, failed to propose any definite settlement, and gave the impression that he wished to avoid fixing the total at present. Another cause of dissatisfaction was the fact that under the Spa agreement France was compelled to make money payments for the coal furnished to her by Germany despite the large sums which Germany owes to her.

Premier Leygues' fall also was hastened by President Millerand's determination to be the dominating factor in the government instead of a figurehead as was the case with his predecessors in the presidency. The premier had not been content to assume a subordinate position and aroused the President's opposition by acting on his own initiative regarding several questions, notably in the negotiations over the return of Constantine to the throne of Greece.

The formation of a new ministry proved to be difficult. Raoul Peret, the new president of the Chamber of Deputies, attempted the task, but failed to effect the combination he had in mind, largely because of the refusal of Raymond Poincaré, former president, to accept a portfolio, except on his own conditions. Aristide Briand, named premier for the sixth time, then made up a cabinet. In case the Chamber rejected the Briand slate, it was expected President Millerand would call M. Poincaré to the premiership, which would mean a drastic policy toward Germany.

Harding Orders Simple Inaugural

PRESIDENT-ELECT HARDING—he no longer is Senator, having resigned that position—has set himself definitely against the plans for elaborate inaugural ceremonies and has directed the committees in charge of the arrangements to abandon all features of the program which would make it an affair of extravagance and pomp. He announced that he would be "a very unhappy participant" in anything suggestive of extravagant expenditure and excessive cost, and urged a "wholesome example of economy and thrift," asking that Congress should appropriate and that the ceremony should take place within the Capitol or on the east porch without a single extra preparation for the occasion.

In accordance with Mr. Harding's wishes the inaugural committees revised their program, eliminating the plans for a large parade and for an inaugural ball. Washington folk had been counting on events which would draw a huge crowd to the capital and yield large profits, but the new arrangements call for a simplicity which will rival that attending the inaugurations of the early presidents.

Plans to hold the inaugural ceremony in the Senate chamber were vetoed because not more than 1,500 persons could be accommodated there, and the President-elect approved the selection of the east porch of the capitol as the scene of his induction into office, weather permitting. For reasons of economy, the erection of a large stand for spectators will be omitted and there will be only a small platform from which

Mr. Harding will deliver his address. Those who wish to see the ceremony will stand on the steps of the Capitol or in the plaza, which will be open to all comers.

According to those in close touch with the President-elect, he never has been in sympathy with the plans for elaborate ceremonies and was relieved when it became apparent that the people of the country

General Tasker H. Bliss told the committee that an American call for a world disarmament conference would be welcomed by the European nations and declared his discussions with statesmen abroad had revealed a sincere desire for disarmament. Like Mr. Daniels he advised against disarming one American soldier or laying up a single American war vessel until a definite agreement had been reached, and urged the completion of the present naval building program.

Lloyd George Suffers Defeat

THE demand in Great Britain for economy in government expenditures has resulted in a defeat for Premier Lloyd George's Coalition ministry, which, while it involved the loss of only one seat in Parliament, was considered by the press as of great importance in showing an overturn of public sentiment and foreshadowing his defeat at the next general election. In the Dover election Colonel Sir Thomas Polson, who had bitterly assailed what he called the "squandermania" methods of the government, won by a majority of 3,130, although that constituency at the preceding election had given a majority of 6,128 to the Coalition-Unionist candidate.

Many of the great newspapers of the United Kingdom have been conducting an intensive campaign against the government on the grounds of waste and extravagance, and even the newspapers friendly to the Premier have admitted there was room for greater economy. Some government organs expressed the hope that the Dover defeat might prove a healthy tonic for the ministry by awakening it to the dangers confronting it.

In virtually every country except Britain, the war-time leaders of government have suffered defeats which spelled their retirement from public office and Lloyd George's success in retaining power has surprised even himself, for several months ago he predicted his fall.

AMERICA OUT OF COUNCIL OF AMBASSADORS. Withdrawal of the United States representative from the Council of Ambassadors, charged with the execution of the Versailles treaty, has been announced, due to the settlement of virtually all questions in which Washington was directly interested.

NEW BOMB PLOT RUMORED. A sudden and swift mobilization of the defensive forces of the New York Police department, and the placing of armed guards at many churches, public buildings, large industrial plants and homes of prominent men evoked reports of the discovery of a widespread radical plot. The cause of such precautions was not explained.

JAPANESE SENTRY KILLS AMERICAN OFFICER. The killing by a Japanese sentry at Vladivostok of Lieutenant Warren H. Langdon, an engineer officer of the United States cruiser Albany, has caused the American Government to send a protest to Japan. The officer, who was in full uniform, was shot in the back, according to official despatches. Japanese officers promised a strict investigation.

AMERICA'S RHINE ARMY TO BE REDUCED. Secretary Baker has ordered the reduction of the American forces in Germany from 15,000 to 8,000 men. The expenses of the occupation are borne by Germany, and on the 15,000 men basis have been $75,000 a day.

TO MAKE NEW YORK DRY. Governor Nathan L. Miller, who recently took office in New York, has sent to the legislature a message urging the enactment of a state prohibition enforcement law in line with the Volstead Act and providing for prohibition enforcement by local authorities throughout the state. The governor denounced lax enforcement of national prohibition by the Federal authorities.

AUSTRIAN GOVERNMENT GIVES UP. The government of Austria has served notice on the Allies that it cannot continue the administration of the nation because of financial difficulties and has sought to place the task in the hands of the Reparations Commission. A conference was called in Vienna to consider Austria's plight.

WITTENBERG CELEBRATES 400TH ANNIVERSARY OF REFORMATION
The 400th anniversary of Martin Luther's destruction of the Papal Bull of Excommunication was observed fittingly in the German city in which that decisive challenge to Rome was issued. The procession is seen passing through the city's Market Square, with the historic Town Hall in the background.

generally would uphold him in insistence on simplicity and economy.

Disarmament Again Discussed

SECRETARY DANIELS, and Norman H. Davis, who is acting as Secretary of State in the absence of Secretary Colby, testified before the House Naval Affairs Committee that they considered the time ripe for a movement toward limitation of naval armaments by international agreement, but indicated that no move in that direction would be taken by the present administration. President Wilson had not attempted to bring about a disarmament conference, Mr. Davis said, because he felt such action would embarrass the incoming administration and had counted earlier on America's participation in the League of Nations to effect the desired result.

Secretary Daniels urged the continuance of work on the uncompleted portion of the 1916 three-year naval building program until an international agreement was reached and reiterated his belief that the United States should build the greatest navy in the world if disarmament proposals failed. Data presented by the Secretary showed that completion of the American building program in 1925 would give to this country a tonnage superiority over the British navy in the ratio of 1.35 to 1, with approximately an equal number of ships; while the ratio with regard to the Japanese navy would be 2.5 to 1. If Japan should build her program, projected but not yet authorized, the ratio in favor of America would be 1.4 to 1.

AND THE AVIATOR WAS NOT EVEN SCRATCHED!
This is all that was left of a mail airplane after it had plunged from 2,000 feet aloft into one of San Francisco's busy streets. Wires broke the force of the fall, but set the machine on fire.

The Faith That Saves

A Sermon by Rev. J. F. COWLING*

TEXT—John 6 : 47. "He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life."

THE day previous to Christ's expressing Himself in the language of our text, He had wrought a great work. It was such as to cause the people of that day to wonder what kind of man He was; and as time passed on He was more and more a wonder to them. Many of them well knew that He was very different from the ordinary man. They saw that He was able to do things that no other had ever done in their midst before.

They could not fully understand His ways nor the meaning of His works. He had provided for many, out of a very meager quantity of victuals, a substantial meal. All were well supplied, and His disciples were wonder-struck, no less than the multitude.

After all were filled they gathered up more than they had at the beginning. They had only five barley loaves and two small fishes to commence with. At the close of the meal they gathered up twelve basketfuls of fragments. A great surprise was this to all. He has been the wonder of the ages and is no less so today! He is better understood today, but is still a wonder.

Such was the effect produced upon the common people by this generous act of His, that they were anxious to see more of Him. For this reason they followed Him to Capernaum the next day. All had not the same idea of Him. Some were curious; others were anxious to gain good; and others were after the loaves and fishes. Jesus said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek Me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled."

Christ had now a good opportunity to address and instruct them on the bread of Heaven and how to obtain it, and He failed, not to improve the time.

THIS portion of Holy Writ is to us, as to them, the guide board. It reveals to us one of the most delightful doctrines of God's Word; it is in fact the key which unlocks the door of death and reveals to us life and immortality.

This passage has often been read and quoted until all of us can repeat it without an effort because of our familiarity with it. Let us enter into an acquaintance with what it teaches; absorb its historical surroundings, submit ourselves to its most excellent instruction and full meaning; then we shall not merely quote it, but our thoughtful souls will be filled with reverence and rapture.

Think of these words not with their present surroundings; our theological institutions and teachers; our many charitable institutions and churches, ministers and the like scattered all over the world; the immense and multiplying ranks of the Master's followers; the fulfilment of the prophecies that have been, and those still remaining to be fulfilled. Let all that now adds to the influence of the coming of the kingdom of Christ, be reduced to that original meanness in which it was compared to a root out of a dry ground; then look at it. Think of it in this shape, then tell us if you are not found standing in the midst of a sea, or an isolation which is a desolation. Get back to the long ago Galilean sea and there listen to that Man, God in human form, as He stands in the midst of the people. Hear Him now as He gives utterance to the text: "He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life."

The world at this time was in despondency. The people were weary and tired listening to the hair-splitting and theory-spinning dreams and devices of the Scribes and philosophers. Faith in a future existence and confidence in an immortal life had become very weak. The world instead of increasing in both was now in a hopeless and heartless state. Dr. J. L. Withrow said: "Bankrupt heathenism had nothing to give; since long ago it had satiated mankind with sensual delights and destroyed the appetite for immortality. They had decried life as only a shadow and taught that it was the chief misery to have to live." When the gloom had grown yet deeper a Latin philosopher who was among the best of them in fame, boldly proclaimed suicide as the privilege of expiring hope. He said: "The gate out of life stands open. Seest thou yon river, yon well? Freedom sits there in the depths. Seest thou yon withered tree? There freedom hangs. Seest thou thy neck, thy throat, thy heart? They are ways of escape from bondage." The mind of the more intelligent became more absorbed in the thought of the beyond the blacker this world grew.

In order that they might be educated in the spirit of resignation, "the gospel of annihilation was diligently preached by Caesar in the Senate and by his echoes throughout the Empire." On the sepulchers of the dead were written such sentences as these: "To eternal sleep." "I was not and became; I was and am no more. Eat, drink, make merry, come." The world was in despair. Darkness had indeed covered at least a great portion of the earth: not all, it is true, but surely enough.

AT THIS period of human history there came into the world One whose outward appearance had but little evidence that He was the Light of the world. He did not look very much like "the bright and morning Star" that was to bring light to us from another world, one which can not be viewed with mortal eye. But when those lips move they tell us of another country and the way thither in tones which are thrilling. Listen! "He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life!"

What a contrast of doctrine. How very different this sounds from the other that had been taught so long and was still in their midst. This is a contradiction of the other. The teacher of this grand doctrine is a mild, unpretending, prudent traveler who goes about teaching all that will listen to Him. His manner and style are so simple and easy that the haughty

There were thousands of people who saw Christ in Palestine and heard Him speak with power and authority, "as never man spake." They saw Him perform miracles such as no other could do; they therefore had no more doubt of His real existence and ability, than they doubted that Herod was their king and Pilate the satrap of Caesar. But what effect did that produce in them so far as everlasting life is concerned? Something more than that is required if we want to be saved; if we are saved.

The belief that Christ was a man and not a myth will have no saving effect on us. It does about as much good to us in the way of saving us as it does to a drowning man to see a rope, long enough and strong enough to save him, floating by his side, but he never seizes it and thereby saves himself; rather he goes down into a watery grave. The rope was of no use to him, because he made no use of it. We may believe that Christ was the best of men, the supreme man; that He was the "white flower" of the human family; that He was more than a man; the most excellent of excellencies, and that will not avail to save us. We must go further than to believe about these, otherwise we shall remain as we are.

So in regard to believing on Christ. We must more than believe that such an One lived and lived a radiant life, clothing His daily life with illustrious deeds; strewing all along His path sweet gentle ministries. We may believe all of this and yet be no better for it. His enemies believed that much, the Scribes, Pharisees and evil spirits. They could not help but believe it, such was His career. We may have a great deal of faith about Christ, and after all it will do us no good whatever. He might as well never have lived or died for the good those get whose faith in Him goes no deeper than to believe concerning Him.

Our faith, however, may come nearer to the point and yet not save us and give us everlasting life. We may believe in Him as a Teacher; we may accept Him as the very Teacher, One that has given more wisdom to the world than any other. We may eulogize His sayings to the utmost of our capacity, but at the same time be far from Him; too far to receive everlasting life.

If we—the entire world—will but receive the moral instructions given by Christ, and practice them daily, we shall come very near to the kingdom; the world would soon be equal to "if not better than Paradise and a brighter glory than Eden's bloom would beautify the earth in a year." The hungry ice-cold selfishness that now fills the world would roll away like snow before the summer's sun. If we receive Him as our example, and imitate Him in all His life, we we shall do well indeed. Then we shall forgive the worst of injuries done to us, for this He practiced. Had He theorized about this only it would have done but little good we fear in a world of retaliation and revenge, which was always admissible, in many cases admirable, in others compulsory.

IT IS possible for us so to believe in Christ as a reformer of society, a helper of the poor, as to live up to the very standard set by Him, and yet not be willing to acknowledge Christ as being anything higher. A faith of that kind, however, will not answer the purpose. If Christ is no more than this, then there has been more than one Saviour in the world.

We must come boldly to the front and receive Christ as the Lamb slain for our sins.

What, then, is the faith that saves? It is that faith which takes Christ for what the Scripture plainly sets Him forth.

It does not take a man of liberal learning, one who must know just so much about a philosophic theory before he can know Christ and His power to save. You ask: But how shall we know that? For centuries it has been tried. From the first century until now some have been presenting philosophic theories to the world about the religion of the Cross, but they are no nearer the truth now than when first they began. Their theories have been repudiated again and again, while the same old doctrine of expiation has rolled on and on, bringing fresh breezes from the realms of bliss.

We must dismiss our trust in these philosophers. Read the Word yourself as it is written and you will see from the earliest scenes of sacrifice on the Jewish altar, down to Calvary, the stream of blood flowing, and on Calvary the last drop shed for the sin of the world. The belief that saves is a belief in Christ for all He was and is; for all He did and suffered. "Believe in Him as Heaven's slain Lamb who paid our debt to law." Believe on Him with a belief full of repose if not rejoicing. Have a confidence in Him that nothing can shake, and that will unite your soul to Him, and you will be saved.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," or "My Faith Looks up to Thee."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 90 : 1-12.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation. (See page 93, first column.)

Sermon—"THE FAITH THAT SAVES"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Blessed Assurance, Jesus Is Mine," or "Abide with Me."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Pardon us, most gracious Master, if any part of our service has been unworthy of our love for Thee, as we go our ways cheered by the light of Thy face, comforted by Thy forgiveness, strengthened by Thy might and hopeful for tomorrow. We ask it for all we love, and ask that we may love all. AMEN.

Pharisee and arrogant Scribe are not worrying about Him. They keep their seats as yet, for the sea is calm. It is only a wanderer on His way somewhere, they care not where just now because their official seats are undisturbed.

Christ moves on about "His Father's business." Morning, noon and night He is busy, sometimes at one place and sometimes at another. Speaking sharply at times, so much so that His words go through the most callous conscience of Pharisee and Scribe, at other times His voice is very gentle. Tender tones of mercy fall on the ears of those who seek His aid.

Time will not permit Christ to dwell on all subjects, hence He takes the one most needed, which is everlasting life. About this He speaks freely and the unheard-of way to gain it. The doctrine of everlasting life in those days was unknown. Some dreamed of an after life, but their wings of faith were too weak to carry them into the spaces of the everlasting. What there was of this existing the surging masses knew nothing, but supposed that all that remained for them beyond the portals of the grave was perpetual sleep, Plutonian night, or nameless nothingness.

WHAT a Gospel this must have been at such a time of darkness: "He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life." There are some kinds of belief that we have about Christ, and as to Christ, that will benefit us but a little. We may believe that He was born in a barn and cradled in a manger and yet with this belief in our hearts we may be lost; if we go no further we shall be lost. Such belief will no more save us than it will put foundations under buildings to believe that God placed granite in this world for that very purpose.

One of the most interesting of the world's mission fields is Mohammedan Africa, where the American missionary is only now gaining a foothold. The disciples of Mohammed are showing signs of alarm at Christian activity and are working diligently to propagate their faith not only over all of Northern Africa but among the tribes of the central part of the continent.

THE DOCTOR-MAN

The American medical missionary still has stubborn competition in the native witch doctor. Above is Dr. C. J. Stauffer, a Methodist missionary in Portuguese East Africa, in amicable relations with his only competitor in the science of healing. The upper right hand corner shows a fearful and various collection of fetishes used by an African native witch doctor. At the left is a witch doctor who might well frighten his patients either to death or recovery, but he will soon give place to the modern man of medicine case and hospital experience. The American medical man on the right, by his kindness and skill, is making friends and converts of the African savage.

Making Things New

SUNDAY. Rev. 21:4. "The former things are passed away." Let us glance at two or three of the things that are missing in the perfected life. "I saw no temple therein." The temple is a temporary structure erected to serve the ends of the invisible Church. If I unduly exalt the scaffolding, if I regard it as an end, and not as a means, I throw my entire life into a false perspective, and I get astray from the pregnant truth. What remains in the life to come in the character the temple has helped to produce—the character of holiness, of fellowship, of praise; the character that apprehends the divine and loves it.

Upon this I must place the emphasis—the spiritual internality, and not upon the temple externality, which will assuredly pass away. Observe, then, the rightful place of symbolism. All symbols are used rightly when they are used as scaffolding—means for the rearing and exaltation of something else, unseen and eternal. But when symbolism is everything, when the scaffolding becomes the perfected structure, and the temple becomes the Church, then no warning judgment can be too emphatic or too intense; for in the great day of test, when "the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is," all temporary scaffolding shall be consumed, and the poor symbolist shall be left without part or lot in the inheritance of the saints in light, for "the former things are passed away."

"There shall be no night there." Then there will be no stars, and, as the Word says, they will "need no candle." These are the things that will be missing, the imperfect lights. The bits of light, the fragmentary revelations, will be supplanted by the perfect glory of the immediate presence of God. We know, in the physical world, how partial and imperfect are the lights of the night. The dominion of the darkness is so immediate and urgent, that we are able to push back the encroachments by only a very little way. Here is a street lamp. Just round about the lamp, where the little flame is burning, there is partial light; but before I reach the next lamp the darkness thickens again, and I feel the intrusion of the night.

Our night-lights are not continuous. They are bits of light, patches of light, "broken lights," broken here and there by an obtrusive darkness which they do not dispel. "There shall be no night there." There shall be no more small night-lights, no candle-lights, no bits of light about God, no partial revelation, but the fullness of the unveiled grace of the eternal God Himself. We are no longer to be dependent upon the light of conscience, the light of Nature, the light of the Bible. "Now I know in part"—in bits of light—"then shall I know even as I also am known." "There shall be no night there."

"Neither shall there be any more pain." Has God no further use for it? No, not in the eternal city. Pain is a minister in early stages, but now its mission is perfected. The dwellers in glory do not know the meaning of the word "pain." It has dropped out of the vocabulary, an obsolete term. "Sorrow and sighing shall flee away." They are all preparatory ministries, and they pass away when their ministry is accomplished. They are part of the Lord's scaffolding, used in the erection of "temples of the Holy Ghost," and when the temples receive their top story, all the scaffolding will be removed. "The former things are passed away." J. H. J.

God's Way With Men

MONDAY. Isa. 55:8. "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways." The world just now is so given over to confusion worse confounded that myopic men are asking, "What shall the end be?" But lift up your eyes and see! The key to the problem is the Cross. The whole logic of events revolves around it. God is having His way through them all, proceeding with calm continuity toward the final consummation which is the Golden Age. The Weaver sits ever at His loom, weaving in the lights and shadows of His kingly robe. The end is to be seen from the beginning.

So much for God's way with the world; let us now observe His way with individual men and women such as ourselves. What, indeed, are we that He should be mindful of us! It is only as we die in Christ unto sin that we live in Him unto righteousness. So do we "rise on stepping-stones of our dead selves to nobler things." We must needs die in order to live; wherefore it is written, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me."

This is God's way of getting the better of our sin. Can you think of any other way? His court is a Court of Equity, wherefore the righteous penalty of the law can not be remitted. How then can God be just and yet the justifier of the ungodly. Lift up your eyes again and see! At Calvary "mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace kiss each other." The Law is fulfilled in the sacrifice of Christ, so that by faith those who were "concluded" under sin come forth into the glorious liberty of the children of God. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. By the Cross He saves utterly; nailing our indictment there, blotting out our sin, sinking it into the depths of an unfathomable sea, washing us, though stained as scarlet, whiter than snow. This, then, is the measure of God; "He so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son to suffer and die for it." If that means anything, it means that if we are ever to know the Father we must become acquainted with Him through His beloved Son. The Incarnation is God's Thought of us coming out to meet our thought of Him "while yet a great way off"; and the Atonement is His Way of Life crossing our desperate footsteps on the way to spiritual death.

"Tasting" God's Goodness

TUESDAY. Psalm 34:8. "O taste and see that the Lord is good." When one is an hungered, seeing others eat, live and thrive, he follows their example, becomes strengthened and satisfied. He knows then by experience that food is good for the body, essential to life. Opinions, arguments and statements do not feed the soul; sitting at the Lord's table, eating of the honey sweets of His love, we are filled with all the fullness of God. Therefore, experimental values are the only true tests.

We know that power was in electricity from Creation's morning, but we failed to know how to utilize it by making the connection. Grace and Truth are in Christ, but men refuse to connect with the divine battery, choosing darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil. We know that a grain of corn abideth alone until it is planted and dies; then all nature brings it to life in a golden harvest. It is dying to live, having nothing to possess all things. We are to taste and see, plant and know, do and live, get the inner light as witnesses. Thus we may verify the truth of God in the only way possible, having Christ in you the hope of glory, the everlasting light of the soul. Grace and growth, love and logic, are under the same law; if we meet the conditions, we will know the vast possibilities of the self-evidential facts of life in Christ.

The Place of Pleasure

WEDNESDAY. Psa. 16:11. "At Thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore." You will get little satisfaction from the definition of "pleasure" in the dictionary. The best definition is found in human experience. As you turn back the leaves of memory, what experiences of the past now bring you the most pleasure? The element of time is needed to determine the purity of our pleasures. Many things that today make their appeal to touch, taste, sight and hearing, will bring no lingering pleasure in the years to come.

We would be false to our faith as Christians if we preached a religion divorced from true pleasure, or if we preached a religion which it was no pleasure to preach. One of the saddest sights is to see people looking for pleasure and not knowing where to look for it. God is the Author of all real pleasure. "At His right hand there are pleasures forevermore." This has nothing to do with the sensual or animal appeal. Its appeal is to the whole nature of man, but it is to the things that are sane, wholesome and satisfying. Such pleasure leaves no bad reactions, no regrets, no disagreeable memories. If we can find pleasure without these things, by all means let us seek it.

The place of God's "right hand" is simply the place where He can enter with us into our pleasure. It is the place of love and peace. The beautiful natural world, enhanced by music and color, a child's clinging arms around your neck, a good book and a true friend, the faith and hope that lift us from despair, the profound satisfaction of a hard day's work, well done—these are the foundations of the pleasure that stays pleasure in the years to come. The highly spiced, delicatessen can not take the place of the old home table.

Opening the Gates of Mercy

THURSDAY. 1 John 2:1. "If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father." Among the surest facts of time and earth and man is that of sin. The Scriptures call it lawlessness or rebellion, but translated into our own terms, it consists in not living up to the best there is in us, in falling short of what we should aim at. So sin is in a real sense missing the mark. However defined, sin is a fact. It is an ugly fact, embittering our sweetest moments and darkening our brightest. It is an universal fact. Wherever the human heart speaks, and in whatever language, it confesses: "O that I had ever lived for one day as I ought to have lived!" It is an atheistic fact. Sin, unarrested, would dethrone God. It is a practical denial of His sovereignty.

But sin is not the only fact. In these words the apostle points to another and even a greater fact. We have an advocate with the Father. The Greek for that word advocate means stand-by. The simplest form of the word is friend. "If any man sin, we have a Friend with God." He is a forgiving friend, an atoning friend, a delivering friend. So we meet fact with fact, overcoming the fact of sin with the fact of Jesus Christ's Saviourhood.

How shall we characterize the fact of Jesus Christ? He is an eternal fact, a fraternal fact, an appealing fact. "More than all in Him we find." Find? Yes, salvation is a matter of seeking. "For every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened." What shall be opened? Mercy's door; the avenue of deliverance from evil; the gates that lead to new life, the life serene, superior, victorious.

The Wonder and Love of Creation

FRIDAY. Job 26:7. "He hangeth the earth upon nothing." Nothing that man can see. God's foundations of force are sure, even though invisible. The natural eye fails to see gravitation, electricity, or any of the mighty powers of nature. We could see God if we could behold His wonderful forces. Faith sees Him everywhere, for what is seen is not made out of things that do appear. The unseen spiritual is the real power. Supernaturalism is everywhere in God's creations as well as in human hearts. The Author and Controller of the universe holds our destiny in the hollow of His hand, and watches over our lives like a benevolent father.

The first and last links of the golden chain of laws are bound about the feet of God. We depend upon nature and nature upon God. He never fails in controlling His forces. Heat, motion, cohesion, light, electricity are all but modes of His power. The spirit of God is in the midst of the wheels of His universe; none are self-existent or automatic. All the multitudes of worlds and peoples are dependent upon His wisdom and mercy. The millions who trust in Him do not hang upon nothing, but are clasped by the hands of Him Who upholdeth all things by the word of His power and the love of His bosom.

The Lord's Side

SATURDAY. Ex. 32:26. "Who is on the Lord's side?" We are reminded of the oft-told incident in the life of President Lincoln. At one of the darkest hours of the Civil War, when things were not going well with the Union Army, Mr. Lincoln was meeting with his cabinet in the White House, when a certain member said: "I do not know, Mr. President, whether God is on our side or not." Lincoln rose; a towering, commanding figure, at the head of the table. "Sir," said he, "it is not a question as to whether or not God is on our side. The question is, whether we are on God's side." And Lincoln seems to have caught the spirit of that other great Emancipator who once thundered through the camps of Israel—"Who is on the Lord's side?"

No more important question could be asked today, in the home, in the church, on the public street. The question is not, "What is your denominational label?" "What church do you go to?" "Who is your minister?" "Do you live a decent, moral life?" or "Do you read your Bible or pray?" The big question to ask men is, "Are you on the Lord's side?" Are you on the Lord's side when you face the big moral issues; when to remain on His side costs you money and popularity? Are you on the Lord's side when it comes time to vote? Are you on the Lord's side when it comes to the choice of your friends and your pleasures?

There is a line of demarcation, unseen but nevertheless well defined, that divides the real Christian from the worldling. Above that line, Christian life manifests itself; below it, it does not; and those who are not for Him are against Him.

Remember this: The golden calf is always in plain sight while the golden crown is usually hidden, save to spiritual eyes. The gods of this world may not seem so crude as in the days of Moses, but they are just as pagan and sensual. They may take the forms of wealth, office, fame or pleasure. Whatever of this world a person bows down to becomes a pagan god. And people who bow the knee to things manufactured are always opposed to all efforts to line up men on moral issues.

It may not be possible or desirable to "standardize" Christians as we do cattle and crops, but we have a perfect right to know where the Christian church begins and the world leaves off.

Home and the Daughter

THE mother who makes housekeeping a pleasant rite rather than a duty is the one who is at the head of a home that runs with thoughtful regularity; where order and peace and harmony reign in the family.

Meals are always prompt to the minute, not with the housekeeper's zeal for promptness, but with the homemaker's loving consideration for her family that food should be there ready for them at the hour they should be hungry for it. All the rooms have a subtle atmosphere that belongs to them. Things are not mixed up in them. Articles that belong in one room are not constantly found poking around in another. The parlor always has the right look, and the kitchen is orderly and immaculate, but full of that special good cheer that belongs in a "real" kitchen. There are always clean towels, the soap never "runs out" and writing materials and stamps are always on the family writing-table. There are never faded flowers drooping in vases, and the water over their stems is always clear. Little things? Yes, but important ones in a daughter's development.

The life of a girl brought up in an orderly home is a joyful apprenticeship in the art of home management. The mother who begins training her daughter by making her responsible, even during childhood, for some of the more simple household tasks will find it easy to extend the training later to all branches of household management. But in order to do this successfully she must herself provide the well-regulated environment of a home where harmony prevails.

It is unfair alike to mother and daughter to have the home as simply a setting for the girl's social life. As long as she remains a member of the family circle a daughter has an obligation, and should have pleasure as well, in giving something of her thought and service toward making the home life happy and joyful for the entire household. If she consistently fails to do this, the cause of her attitude can often be traced back to the mother's failure to make her responsible as a child for some part of the regular work in a home that she herself has made "homey."

The Fireless Cooker

THERE are fireless cookers in many homes, but it has been discovered that the majority of housekeepers are using them only about half as much as they could, and in no sense are trying to make them pay for themselves. The breakfast cereal is cooked in the fireless cooker, because it is decidedly convenient, and sometimes a boiled ham or a piece of corned beef is put into it to cook, but all too few housewives make a practice of getting entire meals in the fireless cooker—even a part of the time.

Pork chops and baked beans can be made the main part of a meal prepared in the fireless cooker. Soak three pints of beans over night, and then parboil them with half a teaspoonful of soda. Drain and put into the cooking vessel and season with salt and four tablespoons of molasses. Over the top spread thin slices of salt pork, and then place over them one pork chop for each person to be served. Heat the disks and put one over and one under the beans; close the cooker and leave the beans in it four hours.

With the addition of a salad and fruit for dessert a very good meal is thus easily prepared.

Or soup and beef loaf may be planned as the hearty portion of the dinner. Put a shank of beef into the cooking vessel with a sliced onion and some parsley, and cover with water. Put over the flame until the meat is heated through and then put into the cooker with a hot disk under it till morning. Then drain off the liquid and remove all the meat from the bones. Cut into small pieces and pack into a breadpan. Strain enough of the liquor to cover the meat, and to every pint add a quarter of a package of gelatine. Season well with salt, paprika and celery salt and pour over the meat. Set away to harden. Now strain the remaining liquid and dilute it with water if it is too strong. If there is not enough of it, add tomato juice and some cooked chopped vegetables or some noodles; heat it, and the soup is ready. With potato chips and boiled rice this would make another good substantial meal.

Preparing Eggless Meals

DURING the winter months the price of eggs often soars beyond the reach of the ordinary pocket-book, and the cold storage supply runs low, so that the problem of managing without the usual number of eggs is a difficult one for the housewife. It is at this season fortunately that sausage, buck-wheat cakes and fried mush with bacon can be eaten with relish for breakfast, and the usual poached or scrambled or fried egg eliminated. There are also seasonable desserts like apple dumplings and pie and mince pie that call for no eggs.

Until March or April, when the price of eggs begins to fall, it is quite possible to obtain our proteins from milk, our fats from milk, butter and meat, and our iron from carrots and raisins and nuts, without using eggs at all. A week's menus, containing proper food values and appetizing qualities, may be arranged by the housewife who is determined to keep her food allowance from being demoralized by the high cost of eggs. Milk and honey, cheese and cereals help out greatly in the preparation of these eggless meals.

Here are some eggless recipes which the housewife may use to advantage:

JOHNNY-CAKE

Mix together one and one-half cupfuls of corn-meal, two and one-half cupfuls of bread flour, one-third of a cupful of sugar and six teaspoonfuls of baking-powder. Add half a teaspoonful of salt to two cupfuls of milk and gradually blend with the dry ingredients. Beat until light; add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter substitute and pour into a shallow pan that has been greased with bacon fat. Brush over the top with additional bacon fat and bake until crisp and brown in a hot oven. This johnny-cake should be nearly all crust and spread thin in the pan. The absence of eggs in this recipe makes more baking-powder necessary.

CHEESE AND LIMA BEAN LOAF

Pass through the meat grinder three-quarters of a cupful of American cheese and a cupful and a half of cooked lima beans. Season with a quarter of a teaspoonful of grated onion, half a teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of chili sauce, one-quarter of a teaspoonful of paprika, two tablespoonfuls of melted bacon fat and a few grains of mustard. Stir in sufficient dry bread crumbs to make a thick paste and place in a buttered pan. Sift buttered crumbs over the top and bake in moderate oven till firm. Baste occasionally while cooking with salted bacon fat mixed with hot water.

MOCK-CHEESE CUSTARD

Scald one cupful of soft bread crumbs with a pint of hot milk for ten minutes. Then add one tablespoonful of butter, half a teaspoonful of salt, a quarter of a teaspoonful of paprika and a few grains of cayenne. Cool the mixture and stir in one cupful of finely shaved cheese, and half a teaspoonful of baking powder blended with a teaspoonful of flour. Turn into a buttered dish, set in a pan of hot water and bake in a moderate oven until set.

NO-EGG SPICE CAKE

One-fourth of a cupful of shortening; one cupful of sour milk; one teaspoonful of soda; two cupfuls of flour mixed with one teaspoonful of cinnamon; one-fourth of a teaspoonful of salt and one-half cupful of raisins. Bake in a slow oven for about one hour.

Shopping for Hosiery

THE usual method of procedure when starting out to buy a pair of stockings is to purchase any that appeal to the fancy, or that look well, and offer a reasonable assurance of durability. Sometimes this turns out all right and the stockings do wear as well as they were expected to. But the really sensible way is to choose a brand that you have found reliable and stick to that particular make.

There are many brands on the market, advertised for style, durability or comfort. A choice of which is the best for your individual purpose may be decided by marking each purchase of a new brand in a distinctive color, and then watching their wearing qualities according to which finds its way first to the darning basket.

When a brand is decided upon, shopping for stockings is forever simplified by always insisting upon that make, and saving the time and energy that is usually expended in "looking around." Tests for the best brands to stick to may be worked out from the assortment of stockings that one buys at bargain sales.

This rule is as applicable to men's socks and children's stockings as it is to women's hosiery.

Household Hints

PLACKET openings will not tear if a hook and eye are sewed to the bottom. Fasten them and flatten together with an iron or pair of pliers.

If the stockings you wash at night are needed in the morning, push balls of crumpled newspapers into them when you hang them up and it will help to dry them more quickly.

To remove a stamp from an envelope, cut a piece of blotting paper to the size of the stamp; soak it in cold water and lay it over the stamp. Remove the blotter in a few minutes and the stamp will come off.

A home-made furniture cleaner that is very effective may be made by adding one tablespoonful of turpentine and three tablespoonfuls of linseed oil to one quart of boiling water. When cool enough to be comfortable to the hand use as a wash water on all furniture except white enamel. It should be applied with a soft cheese cloth and a dry piece for a wiping cloth will give the good polish of clean wood.

A large glass paste jar, the kind with a well for the brush, makes a very handy outfit for greasing tins, waffle irons, etc. Fill the jar with soft grease or oil and keep the brush in the well, ready for use.

To clean a white felt hat use one part of borax and three parts of flour. Sift the mixture three times, and then rub into the hat. Wrap in a clean towel and put aside over night. Brush out the powder, and repeat the process if necessary.

In washing any delicate material with gasoline if salt is added there will be no stain left at the edges of the washed part.

An Orchard in Winter

By ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

LIKE some gray pilgrim band forlorn, the trees
Stand ghostly on the hillside's sloping way,
With arms uplifted high as if to pray
Some woodland god to hear their bitter pleas.
Stripped by the robber winter's harsh decrees,
Remembering the glory of the May,
They wait their martyrdom—so one might say,
A stranger to the time of bloom and bees.

Yet doubting hearts in June might here behold
A miracle by spring's shy blessing wrought,
When dim with fragrant mists the gray trees lean,
And learn while buds unfurl their pink and gold,
A lesson by an older prophet taught
Of beauty dwelling where no eye had seen!

Dear Sir or Madam:

WE are now at the beginning of a great new time in the world of men and business.

Economy has come into its own.

There is a tendency among men and women everywhere to check waste wherever it is found.

Extravagance is no longer respectable. Neither among merchants nor the folks who buy from them.

* * *

Take the tire business, for instance.

Suppose you had walked through the automobile section of any important city a few months ago and taken note of the things seen in the windows, in the racks and on the shelves of some of the tire shops.

Tires and tubes of a dozen different makes. Treads of every conceivable design. A mixed and jumbled stock that was duplicated over and over again in the same store.

At the time people said these heavy and wasteful stocks were all a matter of demand and supply—and thought nothing more about it.

Some said it was good for trade.

And so it went on, until finally everybody—motorists and dealers alike—found out they could not afford it.

Where there is needless work, duplication of material, wasteful investments, a low standard of service follows. The public suffers.

* * *

Now we find the alert tire-merchant selecting and concentrating.

We find him using his capital and his energy to the best purpose.

We find him giving every ounce of both to the saving and service of his customer.

We find him using his special knowledge and experience in selecting the best in all the tire-market and concentrating on these goods.

* * *

It remained for the United States Rubber Company to create a line of tires on which a dealer could concentrate and always be sure of meeting the tire requirements of every single motorist in his community.

So that when a man comes into his store looking for a tire, he will always have the right kind of tire to give him—right as to size, right as to quality, and right for the amount of money he is going to charge him.

A tire for every need and for every pocketbook. In five scientifically designed treads. In all sizes.

So that he will not have to tie up his working capital in unnecessary purchases.

So that his expenses for bookkeeping, for storage, for depreciation, will be reduced to a minimum.

So that he will always have a plentiful assortment of fresh, high quality tires on hand.

* * *

Where will you give your trade?

Will you give it to the man who sells every kind of tire; who lets price decide for you instead of value? Who shirks a real merchant's responsibility and puts it up to you to pick a good one.

No. You will go out of your way to find the dealer who sells one line of tires, who selects them because they are the best and most economical, who backs them with all his strength and energy and reputation.

In the light of these new times he is the real tire-merchant.

C. A. Templeton, Inc., Waterbury, Conn., sells more tires than any other local dealer—and more than many other dealers in cities three times bigger than Waterbury. He handles only United States Tires. Concentration did it.

Note How Raisins Promote Beauty

Through Their Iron Content

—According to Authorities

HERE are reasons for the raisins that you have overlooked, perhaps:

Raisins are one of the richest of all foods in natural iron of the most ready assimilable kind.

It is this iron—a new small portion of it daily in the blood—which promotes the pretty rose-tint in women's and children's cheeks.

Men also need the vigor that depends on proper iron supply.

You can get it through the use of raisins.

* * * *

Boiled rice with raisins has a new attraction. Also bread pudding and other puddings and desserts.

Try them in the children's oatmeal, and in cakes, cookies, rolls and scores of other foods like these.

You add more than new deliciousness, for raisins furnish 1560 calories of energizing nutriment per pound.

Don't Miss a Salad So Delicious

1 cup SUN-MAID Seeded Raisins 2 cups chopped apples or pears
 ¼ cup lemon juice 2 cups coarsely shredded lettuce
 1 cup cream mayonnaise

Wash and dry the raisins, add to the apples and lemon juice. Line bowl or plates with shredded lettuce; pile raisins and apples in center, cover with mayonnaise; serve with Neufchatel cheese balls and garnish top with small pieces of red, tart jelly. Shredded lettuce is a matter of taste. It will go farther and decorates better if shredded.

SUN-MAID RAISINS

The finest raisins, costing no more than others, are made from California's best table grapes, kinds so juicy, tender and thin-skinned that they cannot stand long-distance shipping.

Taste these plump, luscious, meaty raisins and you'll always want this brand for all home uses. Sold by grocers everywhere.

Three varieties: Sun-Maid Seeded (seeds removed); Sun-Maid Seedless (grown without seeds); Sun-Maid Clusters (on the stem).

Ask us to mail this valuable book to you. Learn how to make delicious raisin foods. Promote red cheeks and ruddy health in your whole family with raisins.

China Famine Relief Moving

THE movement to raise dollars in America for transportation into food and relief supplies for the many millions of Chinese, stricken by the famine in North China, is enlisting the support of many bodies. It is gratifying to note that Chinese in America have thrown themselves spontaneously and wholeheartedly into the work to relieve the suffering of their less fortunate brothers.

The full power of all churches in America—for the first time acting simultaneously in a great charitable effort—has been enlisted by the American Committee for China Famine Fund, to come to the rescue of the fifteen million people facing starvation. No philanthropic movement ever undertaken in this country, according to Rev. F. W. Bible, director of church organization for the committee, has aroused such a united response from the religious world.

The co-operation of the Catholic Church is indicated in the naming by Cardinal Gibbons, himself a member of the American Committee, of Bishop O. B. Corrigan, of Baltimore, to represent him actively in the work. Here, as in China at the scene of the calamity, denominational differences have been set aside, and churchmen of different creeds are working as a unit to meet what advices from missionaries and American consular officials describe as the most fearful disaster in history.

February 6 has been set aside as "China Famine Sunday" by the committee, and responses indicate that it will be observed in practically every church in the land. Clergymen have been supplied with the cold facts of conditions in the five famine-swept provinces of North China—a territory of 100,000 square miles embracing a population of 45,000,000 souls—and the appeal will be for some contribution, large or small, from every church-goer. The committee has prepared a schedule which will show each contributor just how much help his contribution will be. Thus: one cent will buy one meal, three cents will save one life one day, one dollar will save a life for one month, five dollars will save a family for one month, six dollars will save one life until the next harvest in June and $1,000 will save a whole village until the next harvest.

CONDITIONS described by President Wilson in his proclamation in December as "appalling" have grown immensely worse with the coming of colder weather, according to the latest cabled reports from Shensi, Chihli, Shansi, Honan and Shantung, the five provinces affected. Thousands are dying daily. The ground, now frozen hard, has cut off the meager supplies of roots and herbs, upon which the famine sufferers had been subsisting in the absence of grain, and they are now literally without anything to eat. The land is a barren waste.

Missionaries have completed a survey of 172 counties with a total of 20,673 villages, and it is upon conditions found in that portion of the area affected that the estimate of 15,000,000 in immediate danger of starvation is based.

Every facility has been obtained by the American Committee for the prompt distribution of funds gathered in this country for famine relief. The International Famine Relief Committee in Peking, we have just learned, working in co-operation with the Chinese government, has co-ordinated the work of the various missionary and charitable organizations, which includes the Christian Herald Committee. Dr. C. Douglas Gray is the chairman of the International Committee.

A cablegram from Nanking, dated January 8, carries its own appeal to our readers:

"Famine situation desperate. Herald relief urgent. Require million dollars before April. Three dollars from each subscriber."

"Z. CHARLES BEALS."

All Churches of America Are Enlisted in the Movement

The Rev. Z. Charles Beals is treasurer of the Christian Herald Committee, organized to administer funds received from our readers and now an important part of the International Committee.

Christian Herald readers have responded most generously to our appeals in behalf of the famine-stricken people, and we hope that they will still continue to help. If contributions keep on coming in the way they have since the Christian Herald first started its fund, not only will the $1,000,000 for which Dr. Beals has cabled be sent to China long before April, but a considerably larger sum.

CHINESE residents in all parts of the country are helping substantially to secure contributions for the relief of their stricken countrymen. In New York, the Chinese Famine Relief Committee, headed by the Hon. I. C. Suez, Chinese Consul-General, has secured almost $20,000.

From other large cities come reports of the intense interest and generous support Chinese in this country are taking in measures to help their brothers in their far-off mother country. In Boston $3,000 has been raised and this, the Chinese in the Hub say, is just a beginning. Chinese in San Francisco have contributed $100,000, and a committee has just started work in Chicago.

Chinese students in American colleges and universities were among the first to respond to the President's appeal for help for the famine sufferers. As a result of their efforts, considerable sums of money have been transmitted to Peking for food and relief supplies.

In China, as well as in this country, Chinese students in American schools are helping in every way to bring relief to the suffering millions. Many have volunteered for relief work in the affected areas, while others have given up eating meat and other foods, subsisting on the scantiest of rations in order to help their countrymen.

The Chinese in America have not only been working energetically among themselves, but are now preparing to lend all possible co-operation to the American Committee for China Famine Fund to help in the raising of funds. Outlines of this co-operation were laid out this week at a conference in the Christian Herald offices attended by I. C. Suez, Chinese Consul-General in New York; Lee Tu, "mayor of Chinatown," a prominent Chinese merchant in the metropolis; the heads of various Chinese associations and Chinese student bodies, and executives of the American Committee.

THE Christian Herald's contribution, made possible by the gifts of our readers, up to January 10 in the effort to save the lives of the starving sufferers was $255,000, including sums sent direct to China and other amounts transmitted through the American Committee.

We are very happy to report that the $300,000 mark has been passed and a long stride made toward the sum of $400,000. The total reported in our issue of January 22 was $270,720.88, representing contributions received up to and including January 5. Since that date, the following sums have been received:

January	6	$ 9,604.09
"	7	9,394.03
"	8	5,083.00
"	10	12,915.55
"	11	5,083.64
"	12	7,068.37

We hope that the response from other Americans will be as generous as has been the support of Christian Herald readers and that the American Committee will be able to send every day enough money to buy food and supplies to enable the millions of sufferers to hold out until the harvest in July.

done for her—if only something could be done! Billy Blanchard must see her at once—he's done marvelous things with the crippled children of the neighborhood!"

With a feeling of sudden confidence Rose-Marie smiled. She realized that she had caught the Superintendent's interest, and her sympathy. It would be easier, now, to give the family their chance! Her voice was more calm as she went on with the narrative. It was only when she told of the death of pa that her lips trembled.

"You'll think that I'm hard and callous," she said, "taking his death so easily. But I can't help feeling that it's for the best. They could never have broken away—not with him alive. You would never have taken them in—if he had had to be included! You couldn't have done it. . . . But now," her voice was a-quiver with eagerness, "now, say that they may come! Say that Mrs. Volsky may take Katie's place. Oh, I know that she isn't very neat; that she doesn't cook as we would want her to. But she can learn and, free from the influence of her husband and son—I'm sure she'll change amazingly. Say that you'll give the family a chance!"

THE Superintendent was wavering. "I'm not so sure," she began, and hesitated, "I'm not so sure—"

Rose-Marie interrupted. Her voice was very soft. "It will mean," she said, "that Lily will be here, under the doctor's care. It will mean that she will get well—perhaps! For her sake give them a chance. . . ."

The Superintendent's eyes were fixed upon space. When she spoke, she spoke irrelevantly.

"Then," she said, "that was where you went every afternoon—to the tenement. You weren't out with some man, after all?"

Rose-Marie was blushing furiously. "No," she admitted, "I wasn't out with a man. I never had any sort of a sweetheart, not ever! I just let you all think that I was with some one because—if I hadn't let you think that way you might have made me stay in. I wouldn't have made a point of deliberately telling you a falsehood—but Dr. Blanchard gave me the idea and—" defiantly, "I just let him think what he wanted to think!"

The Superintendent stood up, laughing.

"What he wanted to think!" she exclaimed, "Oh, Rose-Marie—you've a lot to answer for! What he wanted to think. . . ." Suddenly the laugh died out of her voice, all at once she was very serious. "Perhaps," she said slowly, "your idea about the Volsky family is a good one. We'll try it out, dear! There was a Man, once, Who said: 'Suffer the little children to come—' Why, Rose-Marie, what's the matter?" For Rose-Marie, her face hidden in the crook of her elbow, was crying like a very tired child.

CHAPTER XV

IT WAS with a light heart that Rose-Marie started back to the tenement. The tears had cleared her soul of the months of evasion that had so worried her—she felt suddenly free and young and happy. It was as if a rainbow had come up, suddenly, out of a storm-tossed sky; it was as if a star was shining all at once, through the blackness of midnight. She felt a glad assurance of the future—a faith in the Hand of God, stretched out to His children. "Everything," she singsonged joyously to herself, "will come right, now. Everything will come right!"

It was strange how she suddenly loved all of the people, the almost mongrel races of people, who thronged the streets! She smiled brightly at a mother, pushing a baby-buggy—she thrust a coin into the withered hand of an old beggar. On a crowded corner she paused to listen to the vague carolings of a barrel-organ, to pat the head of a frayed-looking little monkey that hopped about in time to the music. All at once she wanted to know a dozen foreign languages so that she could tell those who passed her by that she was their friend—their friend!

And yet, despite her sudden feeling of kinship to these people of the slums, she did not loiter. For she was the bearer of a message, a message of hope! She wished, as she sped through the crowded streets, that her feet were winged so that she might hurry the faster! She wanted to see the expression of bewilderment on Mrs. Volsky's face, she wanted to see a light dawn in Ella's great eyes, she wanted to whisper a message of—of life, almost—into Lily's tiny, useless ear. And, most of all, she wanted to feel Bennie's warm, grubby little paw touching her hand! Jim—she hoped that Jim would be out when she arrived. She did not want to have Jim throw cold water upon her plans—which did not include him. Well she knew that the arrangement would make no real difference to him; it was not love of family that kept him from leaving the dirty, crowded little flat. It was the protection of a family, with its pseudo-respectability, that he wanted. It was the locked room, which no one would think of prying into, that he desired.

SHE went in through the mouth-like tenement door—it was no longer frightful to her—with a feeling of intense emotion. She climbed the narrow stairs, all five flights of them, with never a pause for breath. And then she was standing, once again, in front of the Volsky's door. She knocked, softly. Then the door swung open.

Jim stood in the doorway. He was in his shirt sleeves but—even divested of his coat—he was still too painfully immaculate, too well groomed. Rose-Marie, looking at him, felt a sudden primitive desire to see him dirty and mussed up. She wished, and the wish surprised her, that she might sometime see him with his hair rumpled, his collar torn, his eye blackened and—she could hardly suppress a hysterical desire to laugh as the thought struck her—his nose bleeding. Somehow his smooth, hard neatness was more offensive to her than his mother's dirty apron, than his small brother's frankly grimy hands. She spoke to him in a cool little voice that belied her inward disturbance.

"Where," she questioned, "are your mother and Ella? I want to see them."

With a movement that was not ungraceful Jim flung wide the door. Indeed, Rose-Marie told herself, as she stepped into the Volsky flat, Jim was never ungraceful.

Jim was dragging forward a chair. He answered.

"Then yer'd better sit down 'n make yourself at home," he told her, "fer they've gone out. They're down t' th' hospital, now, takin' a last slant at pa. Ma's cryin' to beat th' band—you'd

Thousands eat it

In this familiar yeast cake medical science finds the one vital element of good health that most other foods lack

IT ISN'T the amount of food you eat that makes you fit, strong and healthy—it's the selection of the right foods. These must contain vitamins. In yeast has been found an almost pure source of the essential vitamins that creates vitality and helps you resist disease.

"Why," you ask, "don't most foods have this vital substance which the human body needs so badly?"

Because in the process of preparing modern foods to meet the whims and fancies of taste and trade most of the vitamins are lost.

Vitamins was first found in the hulls of grains. But the hulls of rice are taken off to make it look better; the hull or bran of wheat, is taken off to make it taste better, and the germ of corn, the inner heart which possesses the precious vitamins, is removed so your corn meal will keep longer.

The marvelous yeast plant, richly endowed by nature, has been known for centuries to possess life-sustaining qualities. The discovery by modern science that yeast is four times as rich in vitamins as any other food has told us "why".

"What is the test of the wholesomeness and the nourishment of one's diet?" you ask.

If the health and appearance of the family are good: if they are strong and well developed for their ages, free from ailments and full of energy and ambition, you may safely feel that their food agrees with them. But if they are listless, frail, undeveloped, always tired, easily upset, irritable and plainly not their real selves; and if a competent physician finds there is no special disease to account for these bad conditions, a mother may well ask herself if the food is right, and if not, how she can make it so.

The contribution of Yeast Foam to the diet has been found to complete it and assure proper nourishment and growth in the children, and build up the health and resistance powers of adults.

Removes cause of boils and pimples

Boils have always been baffling because the cause could not be easily reached.

Now it is known that by a slight change of diet including Yeast Foam, the body is nourished and built up by that vital substance of which yeast is the richest source—vitamins.

Yeast Foam gives that vigorous bodily health which medical authorities agree is the best protection against skin eruptions—merely surface indications of internal disorders due to a run-down condition.

How to take Yeast Foam

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals.

Some prefer to eat it buttered like a cracker. Others wash it down with a little water or milk. You will quickly learn to like its taste.

For Constipation

Most ordinary laxatives treat the result and not the cause of constipation. Yeast Foam, composed of countless marvelous little plants of a vegetable nature, acts as a gentle laxative and is being used with success in cases of intestinal sluggishness.

It is not a drug. It forms no habit. What it does is to gradually restore the normal action of the lower intestine by acting upon the cause of constipation.

Until the yeast has a chance to assist the normal function, do not expect immediate results if accustomed to taking laxatives regularly.

think that she really liked him! An' Ella's cryin', too—she's f'rgot how he uster whip her wit' a strap when she was a kid! An' they've took Bennie; Bennie ain't cryin' but he's a-holdin' to ma's hand like a baby. Oh," he laughed sneeringly, "it's one grand little family group that they make!"

Rose-Marie sat down gingerly upon the edge of the chair. She did not relish the prospect of spending any time alone with Jim, but a certain feeling of pride kept her from leaving the place. She would not let Jim know that she feared him—it would flatter him to think that he had so much influence over her. She would stay, even though the staying made her uneasy!

"When did they go out?" she questioned, trying to make her tone casual. "Do you expect them back soon?"

Jim sat down in a chair that was near her own. He leaned forward as he answered.

"They haven't been gone so awful long," he told her, "An'—say—what's th' difference when they gets back? I never have no chance to talk wit' you—not ever! An'," he sighed with mock tragedy, "an' I have so much t' say t' yer! You never have a word fer me—think o' that! An' think o' all th' time yer waste on Bennie—an' him too young t' know a pretty girl when he sees one!"

ROSE-MARIE flushed and hated herself for doing it. "We'll leave personalities out of this!" she said.

Jim was laughing, but there was a sinister note in his mirth.

"Not much we won't!" he told her, "I like you—see? You're th' best-lookin' girl in this neck o' woods—even if you do live at the Settlement House! If you'd learn to dress more snappy—t' care more about hats than yer do about Bible Classes—you'd make a big hit when yer walked out on Delancey Street. There ain't a feller livin' as wouldn't turn t' look at yer—not one! Say, kid," he leaned still closer, "I'm strong fer yer when yer cheeks get all pink-like. I'm strong fer yer any time a-tall!"

Rose-Marie was more genuinely shocked than she had ever been in her life. The flush receded slowly from her face.

"You'd like me to be more interested in clothes than in Bible Classes!" she said slowly, "You'd like me to go parading down Delancey Street. . . ." she paused, and then— "You're a fine sort of a man," she said bitterly—"a fine sort of a man! Oh, I know. I know the sort of people you introduce to Ella—and she's your sister. I've seen the way you look at Lily, and she's your sister, too! You wouldn't think of making things easier for your mother; and you'd give Bennie a push down—instead of a boost up! And you scoff at your father—lying dead in his coffin! You're a fine sort of a man. . . . I don't believe that you've a shred of human affection in your whole makeup!"

JIM had risen slowly to his feet. There was no anger in his face—only a huge amusement. Rose-Marie, watching his expression, knew all at once that nothing she said would have the slightest effect upon him. His sensibilities were too well concealed, beneath a tough veneer of conceit, to be wounded. His soul seemed too well hidden to be reached.

"So that's what you think, is it?" he asked, and his voice was almost silky, it was so smooth, "so that's what you think! I haven't any 'human affection in my makeup,'" he was imitating her angry voice, "I haven't any 'human affection!'" he laughed suddenly, and bent with a swift movement until his face was on a level with her face. "Lot yer know about it!" he told her and his voice thickened, all at once, "lot yer know about it! I'm crazy about you, little kid—just crazy! Yer th' only girl as I've ever wanted t' tie up to—get that? How'd yer like t' marry me?"

For one sickening moment Rose-Marie thought that she had misunderstood. And then she saw his face and knew that he had been deadly serious. Her hands fluttered up until they rested, like frightened birds, above her heart.

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

A Free Trial Package is Mailed to Everyone Who Writes.

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He named it Powderpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is cold water to make a paint, weather proof, fire proof, sanitary and durable for outside or inside painting. It is the cement principle applied to paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Write to A. L. Rice, Inc., Manufacturers, 107 North St., Adams, N. Y., and a free trial package will be mailed to you, also color card and full information showing you how you can save a good many dollars. Write today.

The Marriage Feast

International Sunday School Lesson for February 6
Matt. 22:1-14

By LUTHER DENNY WHITTEMORE, Litt.D.

THERE are three ways in which the parable of the marriage feast may be considered: first, as an entertaining story told by a matchless story-teller; second, as an event of serious significance at a critical moment in the life of Jesus; and, third, as a moral lesson applicable to our own conduct.

The story. To any person of ordinary intelligence and imagination, old or young, this parable is interesting simply as a story, regardless of its original setting and purpose. The attention is attracted by the human interest. The details are sufficiently distinct to produce a picturesque effect. Pleasurable emotions are aroused by the invitation to a marriage feast and the prospect of a season of joyous festivity. The invitation is given by a king whom it should be a delight to honor. The hero is the prince, the center of interest in many a tale of the imagination. The peculiar Oriental customs, such as the sending of messengers a second time to summon the guests when the feast is ready and the wearing of wedding garments provided by the host, give an attractive local color. An element of surprise is introduced by the indifferent response of those first invited, from whom ordinary courtesy at least might have been expected. Indignation is excited towards those whose indifference develops into cruelty and who commit a crime against the unoffending servants of the king. The dilemma of a guestless feast creates a problem whose solution calls for literary skill. The movement towards the climax is delayed by an offending individual who turns the culminating scene from festivity to tragedy.

Here are all the essentials of literary art, and the story is really a miniature drama capable of being enacted. It represents a human problem with conflicting acts and motives and with appropriate penalties for moral failure. Even a child can tell what ought to have been the response of those who were invited, and why the man was speechless who appeared among the guests without the wedding garment. Like all best stories, this one needs no elaborate interpretation, for its meaning and moral lesson are self-evident.

The event. The parables of Jesus are more than entertaining stories. Each one was prompted by a definite purpose or suggested by the immediate circumstances; and each one is the vivid and powerful expression of a vital truth which could not be presented so effectively in any other way. Thus the parable of the mustard seed shows the promise of small beginnings and is a wonderful stimulus to faith; the parable of the hidden treasure shows the incomparable value of the kingdom of heaven and offers a mighty inducement to seek it first; the parable of the good Samaritan gives a new definition of neighborliness and has produced an endless chain of neighborly acts of kindness and mercy.

The parable of the marriage feast should be considered in connection with the two others which, in Matthew, immediately precede. Following in rapid succession, the parables of the two sons and the wicked husbandmen and the marriage of the king's son, show the marvelous resourcefulness of Jesus' mind; and their effect must have been cumulative, driving home the charge of disobedience, dishonor, and disloyalty, and laying bare the false pretenses of those who professed to be the highest authorities in religion, and who dared to ask Jesus concerning the source of His authority.

The priests and Pharisees must have understood the logic of these three parables which Jesus spoke against them, for in answer to Jesus' question "Which of the two sons did his father's will, the one who first refused to obey and afterwards repented or the one who professed obedience and yet disobeyed, they said, "The first"; and when Jesus asked them what the wronged householder would do to those wicked husbandmen who had killed the landlord's son and seized the inheritance, they replied, "He will miserably destroy those miserable men." Although they perceived that Jesus spoke of them, they did not recognize, or at least did not confess their sin, but, as Jesus had foreseen, they persisted in their wicked purpose and provoked the terrible denunciations which He presently pronounced upon them.

When Jesus spoke the parable of the sower, He was surrounded by a sympathetic multitude eager to learn of Him; but He spoke the parable of the marriage feast in the presence of His enemies, who were watching every word so that they might find some excuse or justification for their predetermined action. Jesus was not disconcerted by their hostile attitude, but met the situation with splendid dignity and poise, using the weapon to which He was accustomed, the parable, which was indeed the sword of the spirit, the very word of God.

In this event, so near the final tragedy in Jesus' life and leading to it, He showed no sign of weakness or hesitation. His serenity and strength are unexplainable unless we acknowledge that He was more than a man. "The grandeur of soul," says Geikie, "which could so utterly ignore the outward and apparent, and realize the essential and eternal; the conscious majesty in the midst of humiliation and danger; the absolute trust that if the present belonged to His adversaries, the everlasting future, in earth and heaven, was all His own, could spring in such a heart only because it felt that it was not alone, but that, unseen by man, a greater than man was ever with Him. Only when we realize Him as enjoying unclouded and absolute communion with eternal truth and love, Man, but also the Incarnate Divine—can we hope to solve the mystery."

THE application. Some have tried to find a symbolic meaning in every phrase of the parable, but this is not essential. Many suggestive lessons, however, are implied.

Although we may not be guilty of deliberately rejecting the kingdom of heaven, whose attractions have become more and more alluring as the centuries have passed, it may be that familiarity with the blessings of Christianity has made us forgetful of our great privilege. Our world is different from that in which Jesus lived, and it is so because His followers in all the ages have continually repeated the gospel invitation. It is our duty and privilege not only to accept this invitation for ourselves, but to become messengers, carrying the good tidings everywhere.

Like those who in the parable went their ways to farm and merchandise, men are now absorbed in the occupations of an industrial and commercial age, too often exalting the commonplace above the fine and splendid and forgetting that life does not consist in the abundance of the things which one possesses.

The discomfiture of the guest who came to the feast without a wedding garment warns us against negligence in so-called minor matters. Art, some one has said, is doing common things beautifully; and what a gift is theirs who seem instinctively to do the fitting thing habitually, while others continually cause embarrassment and suffer humiliation! Particularly are we warned against assuming lightly the obligations of our religion. Reverence is not wholly a matter of outward forms and ceremonies. There is no substitute or equivalent for the life of the spirit which is hid with Christ in God.

Young People's Topics for February 6

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

Modern Progress, Modern Un- righteousness

E. L. Hos. 4: 1-10.

HOSEA, in the first verse of the reference, speaks of the Lord as having a controversy with the inhabitants of the land because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land. Is the contention "no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God" true today? Is there nothing in the world to tell us that our faith is conquering? Has revelation ceased from God because men have deafened their ears to his voice? Or is the world growing better year by year?

In the light of current missionary events, what do the members of the Epworth League think? In the face of such great things as the Centenary and similar movements, in the home and foreign field, what is the verdict concerning the status of Christianity today? When we have national prohibition, and the world is becoming dry; when the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. and kindred organizations are belting the globe; when heathenism is meeting at the foot of the Cross by the hundreds of thousands, and churches, hospitals, colleges and institutions of mercy and help are dotting the horizon there is no question concerning the progress and triumph of the Christian faith. And if there is so much good being done here and there, rest assured it is because of individual righteousness everywhere. The words of the poet are coming true:

"Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Doth his successive journeys run;
His kingdom stretch from shore to shore,
Till moons shall wax and wane no more."

A SURRENDERED and VICTORIOUS Life

C. E. Gal. 2: 1-7

"THAT the truth of the gospel might continue with you," writes Paul to the Galatians. We have purposely put the words "Surrendered" and "Victorious" in capital letters. There can be no victory without surrender. This may seem out of reason on the battlefield, but not in the arena of our faith. There are two forces in the human heart contending for the supremacy and rulership of our lives. Those forces are sin and righteousness. We must make the decision whether Christ or the devil will be permitted to rule our lives. Surrender to Jesus Christ, obedience to his will, makes for victory. Giving up to and going over to the side of the devil makes for loss.

It is the old, old story again, of "putting off the old man and putting on the new man," to use the words of Paul. It is the old story of that universal dualism inherent in the human race, the Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde at death's grip for our souls. It is the age-old combat between the things of heaven and of earth, things unseen and seen, low standards of living or high ideals of thought and conduct. Give Jesus Christ His perfect way and sway and you will find yourself living in a new environment.

The meeting may be made profitable if the members bring the testimony of famous Christian men and women concerning their estimate of Jesus Christ and what the surrendered life meant to them and the victories won through such surrender. Read "The Overcoming Life," by D. L. Moody, and "The Deeper Experiences of Famous Christians," by G. Lawson, for light on this theme.

Questions and Answers

MRS. E. B. N., Lebanon, Pa., writes: "Would it not be a help to the Sunday school if there could be more preaching done from the pulpit, encouraging the members to attend the Sunday school?"

To this, Dr. L. D. Whittemore (who conducts the Sunday School Department in the Christian Herald) gives the following reply: "In those places where the Sunday school is most successful, it is considered as an essential part of the church, and not as a distinct organization. Therefore the members of the church, as well as the minister, should take an active interest in the welfare of the school, and do everything possible to increase the attendance and to make attendance very much worth while. An occasional sermon would surely be a help; but perhaps frequent mention of the advantages of Sunday-school attendance would be more effective than a sermon urging attendance as a matter of duty."

Any World Outlook subscribers who have preserved copies of that publication for May and November, 1919, and January and September-October, 1920, are requested to communicate with the Mail-Bag. In replying, please send full name and address.

S. S. G., Uxbridge, Mass.: We have known some very worthy and spiritual-minded Armenian pastors. The Armenians belong to a very ancient nation which through all its trials has held bravely to the faith as it was delivered in apostolic times. There is a tradition that the Armenian city of Edessa was probably the first community outside of Palestine to accept the Gospel. The Armenian church forms are distinctive, but they hold the same essentials of the faith as the western Christian nations. The missionaries of our American Board can testify that there are many exemplary Christians among the Armenians, who make excellent ministers. We would advise you to write for all necessary information to the Secretary of the American Board of Foreign Missions, Boston, Mass. This would doubtless help you in solving the present difficulty in your church.

In the footnote to the sermon published in the Christian Herald on November 27, it was stated that Professor Slaght was at the head of the Department of Philosophy at Baker University, Baldwin, Kansas. He has now become head of the Department of Philosophy at Cornell College, Mt. Vernon, Iowa.

M. H. Fleming, Colo. There is no record to warrant the statement that Jesus Christ was ever in Rome.

Mrs. A. S., Idaho, a farmer's wife, takes exception to some of the criticisms on farmers that are written by people "who, although they may own land, are not themselves real farmers. If they had gone on," she says, "with nothing to buy land with and little or nothing with which to improve it, they would not seek to belittle or besmirch the farmer. Farmers in Idaho two years ago, according to government statistics, received on the average a little above $400, as income. How would those critics like to have the jobs of our Idaho farmers? . . . The farmers and laborers are making a brave fight for clean business and politics, and if you will go to some minister who knows the real facts and listen to him unbiased, you will change your mind and help us to work for righteousness and justice."

Three Splendid Styles Offered With The Christian Herald

HOME

IN THIS age of mighty events, that have shaken the world to its foundations, the Bible should be in every home in our beloved land. These are "times of fulfilment" and we need God's Word more than ever. Upon those who honor Him and study His message, He bestows spiritual understanding and great blessing. The Christian Herald, which in the last forty years has manufactured and put in circulation more Bibles than all other religious publications in America, outside of the Bible Societies, has scored its greatest triumph in the production of the new Photogravure Red Letter Bible.

Domenico Mastroianni has been called the Tissot of Sculpture. He has spent the greater part of his life time in the Orient, and especially in Palestine. He studied people, customs, dress, until he became able to express in his art the unchanging spirit of the Holy Land and its people. All of his work is instinct with life; every figure seems to move and breathe; his landscapes, lakes and rivers have an atmosphere that heightens the charm of his wondrous art. His genius has given us a new revelation in the sublimest of all pictorial themes—Bible Illustration. Every one of the 48 sculptures is an artistic triumph.

"The Bible Beautiful" is presented in a setting worthy of the priceless volume. It is the ideal Bible for the Home, being printed in clear, legible type that is easily read without straining the eyes. It is equipped with the latest aids and helps, and in addition has 16 maps of Bible Lands, in colors. A great charm, however, is added to the Book by the 48 splendid, full-page photogravure reproductions of the world famous sculptural masterpieces by Domenico Mastroianni.

Produce

Food costs today are nearly double those of 1914, but there has been little or no increase in the cost of your home garden. The air and the rain and the sunshine are just as free to everyone today as in 1914, and the results are just as big.

If your income has increased in proportion to the general rise in prices, you can get the full benefit of the increase by continuing to produce your summer's food yourself. If it has not, you have a double reason for a garden of your own.

Produce

Make your 1921 garden a better garden by giving it better attention and better seeds. We can help you to both; our full experience of seventy-five years is at your service in every way. The name "Henderson" on a packet of seeds means that everything we have learned in all those years has been done to make them the best that can be produced. Forty Years of Christian Endeavor

The First Society Was Founded February 2, 1881

MY MANY friends who read the Christian Herald and who assure me of their interest in the Christian Endeavor cause as they see its progress reported in this magazine from time to time, encourage me to give a little summary of God's leadings during these last twoscore years since the formation of the first society. Few, if any, organizations have been more distinctly children of Providence than Christian Endeavor. It had no wealthy sponsors, no ecclesiastical patronage, no denominational backing at the beginning. It was unknown and came unheralded and un- blessed by any but God.

Some fifty young people came together at their pastor's house on February 2, 1881, with no thought of accomplishing anything of great moment. The pastor himself, young and inexperienced, was only trying an experiment for his own young people, though an experiment over which much thought and prayer had been expended.

He never supposed there would be another society of Christian Endeavor than that in Williston Church, Portland, Maine, and was much surprised when, eight months later, he heard of one in Massachusetts, and then of another in Maine and another in Missouri and another in California. Soon letters began to come from the Hawaiian Islands, from China and England and Central Europe—from Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Disciples, Quakers, Moravians, Lutherans, and all the Reformed churches; from white and red and black and tan-colored peoples, asking about the society or telling of societies that these polyglot, polychromatic and poly-denominational people had started.

How could one be anything but amazed at such developments and how could he do anything but exclaim: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us but unto thy name give glory?"

FROM that day to this the growth has continued in no spasmodic way, but, one after another, denominations and nations have been added to the ever lengthening list until now, in eighty-five countries and in over one hundred different denominations Christian Endeavor societies flourish.

At least eighteen millions of people in America are now or have been in their youth connected with such societies, beside some millions more in other lands.

It is safe to say that one-sixth of the people in the United States have been influenced in some degree in their religious life by these young people's societies, and a multitude have been very profoundly influenced, the whole trend and tenor of their lives having been changed by the resolves made in these young people's meetings, and carried out through the work of their committees and their unions.

There is no parable of our Lord's more significant than that of the mustard seed. We will not be hindered or perplexed in our consideration of it by the meticulous critic who declares that the mustard seed is not the "smallest of all seeds," and that it does not, in our country, at least, grow into a tree, in whose branches the birds may lodge.

These statements may have been literally true of the plant our Lord had in mind. In any event, His meaning is perfectly plain, and that is that the largest results, with God's blessing, come often from measured by the power of growth which God put into it at the beginning and the uses for which He designed it.

So it was with the Christian Endeavor movement. It was indeed a weak, human instrumentality which gave it birth, but God had a design for the movement, and God gave it life and growth. It has been opposed by sectarians, criticized by conservatives, who oppose every new thing, denounced by the fearful who distrust youth, but it has grown because there was life in its small beginning, and because God took care of it and nourished it.

SCORES of new plans for training young people have been started during the last forty years. Some of them eminently useful and successful; many of them like the bumble-bee, which is said to be larger at its birth than at any other period of its existence.

But the Christian Endeavor movement, though threatened at times, has survived every effort to supplant it and is now stronger by far on its fortieth birthday than ever before in its history. The reasons for this in my opinion are the following: First it has a thorough, uncompromising religious basis. Its trysting place is the young people's prayer meeting where it receives power from on high. Its Magna Charta is the pledge which begins, "Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise Him that I will strive to do whatever He would have me to do." Its cable that connects it with Divine power is prayer, "I will read the Bible and pray every day." Its practical program, "Throughout my whole life I will endeavor to live a Christian life." Its anchor Loyalty, "I will support my own church in every way." Its sails, Helpfulness and Fellowship.

The definition of the object of that first society was "To increase the mutual acquaintance of the members and to make them more useful in the service of God." How that "mutual acquaintance" has widened and strengthened! It was confined at first to the two-score and ten young people who were members of that first society. It widened with the second society, still more with the third, and then by leaps and bounds increased, as society was added to society, union to union, denomination to denomination, country to country, adopting in general the same pledge and plans and methods of work, with infinite variations, to be sure, to suit local needs, but with the same spirit and the same general framework of active Endeavor.

Christian Endeavor has been truly said to "specialize in fellowship." Under God's leadership literally millions of young people have come together in the great world's conventions, in the smaller national conventions, and the local union gatherings. More than 50,000 registered delegates have attended two or three of these conventions. In a number of countries the attendance has been numbered by tens of thousands, and an attendance of thousands at state and even some county conventions is a commonplace affair. All these meetings are practically fellowship meetings, where soul meets soul, mind meets mind, and where aspiration meets answering aspiration.

We hear and read much about church unity. One magazine headed a recent article with the Williston Church, Portland, Maine, in which the first Christian Endeavor society was founded the smallest beginnings. The tiny seed falls into the ground. It seems, to look at, not only small but worthless. It is covered up, buried out of sight. What chance has it to grow into a great shrub or tree? Ah, God knows. The seed is His, the soil is His, the sunshine and the rain are His. He does not suffer that minute seed to die. He that cares for the life of the sparrow, cares for the lower form of life wrapped up in that seed. The first little shoot peers above the brown soil of spring time. It expands, it grows in bulk and stature and its ultimate size is only discouraging title, "Church Union as a 'Great Illusion,'" though the text of the article was not disheartening. The absolute union of all in one great denomination is doubtless an "illusion," but Christian Endeavor has pointed the way to a practical union in effort and spirit by the young people of the different denominations.

While each Endeavorer sticks to his own denomination, learning its tenets and its history, taking pride in its great champions, and being thoroughly loyal to its meetings and missionary enterprises, the young people of all evangelical sects come together on a common basis of love and service for Jesus Christ. The Endeavor society's one creed and covenant is, "I will strive to do whatever He would like to have me do."

Christian Endeavor unions—national, state, district and local—exist now in almost every country beneath the sun. In Tokyo and Bombay, in Berlin and Helsingfors, in Rio de Janeiro and Cape Town, in Sydney and Reval, these unions flourish as well as in every considerable city and district in America and Great Britain. In London some four hundred Christian Endeavor societies are united in nineteen district unions, and these in one great London Federation, of which Rev. F. B. Meyer is president.

The other sail which wafts Christian Endeavor on its way is united service for the Master. "I will strive to do whatever He would like to have me do." This fellowship in service, promoted by the 2,500 Christian Endeavor Unions throughout the world, has resulted in an endless variety of welfare work for the community and for special classes. United tent services, street preaching and singing, meetings in car-barns and fire-engine stations, fresh-air camps for children, "holiday homes" for adults, and especially in efforts for people who are down, "but never out," as the Salvation Army folks declare, are some of the results of these endeavors. There are many prison societies of Christian Endeavor throughout the country, a movement started in Kentucky twenty-five years ago by Frederick A. Wallis, now Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island.

From Kentucky the prison work has extended to many other states, and wardens and chaplains alike testify to the blessing the society has been to a multitude of prisoners. Hundreds have been converted in these societies, and so far as I have heard, none of the genuine Endeavorers has ever been sent back to prison again.

ANOTHER interesting feature has been the army and navy groups, the latter called Floating Endeavor societies. Hundreds of these have been formed on ships of war and merchant vessels of American and English ships, and one even in the Japanese navy.

There are also Floating Societies on shore, which do not necessarily float, composed of young people in the church societies who are especially interested in the sailors. They hold meetings on ships in port, supply comfort bags and other "creature comforts," and write letters of cheer to be read at sea. Such societies are active in such ports as Philadelphia, Chicago, San Diego, San Francisco, and particularly in London, Liverpool, and Southampton in England.

During the late war there were many temporary societies in the training camps at home and the trenches abroad. A few still remain among the Army of Occupation in Germany.

My space will not allow me to dwell further upon these forty happy years of Christian Endeavor. I hope I have made it plain that I am writing in no spirit of self-gratulation. There is no room for this when we recount God's evident and constant leading.

I will only add that one of the greatest of the World's Conventions of Christian Endeavor societies will be held in New York in Madison Square Garden next July, from the 1st to the 11th of the month.

Mr. Wallis, of whom I have spoken before, is chairman of the Committee of Arrangements. Dr. Daniel A. Poling and Rev. Harry Kinports are managing the local end of the convention, while those of us at the headquarters of the United Society in Boston are doing all we can with God's blessing to make it not only an impressive demonstration of Christian fellowship, but a convention of such magnificent proportions and spiritual power that Christian New York will long remember it.

I would advise all readers of the Christian Herald who can possibly do so to make a point of attending this vast convention, which will not only never be forgotten by those who participate in it, but which will be the means, we trust, of quickening the spiritual life and activities of tens of thousands.

The New York Idea in the African Jungle

The Fifth Article in a Series on "New Worlds"

By WILLARD PRICE

BROADWAY and Fifth Avenue have gone to Africa. In one remote African village the sole costume of the chief consisted of a few wildcat tails and a pair of spats. The spats had been manufactured in the garment-workers' district on lower Fifth Avenue.

In another village the natives were crooning an American jazz melody popular on Broadway five years before. Their teacher had been a Pullman porter on the New York Central.

American influence is most evident in the republic of Liberia. Sir Harry Johnston has called Liberia "the land of the cult of the dress-suit." The inhabitants of the civilized part of the country are descendants of former slaves from our own South, who were transported to Africa by the American Colonization Society. A republic was organized for them under the protection of the American Government. So the good old Southern fashions of antebellum days persist in Liberia, and there, on Sunday, walk gentlemen in frock coats and top hats, accompanied by white-gloved ladies with ruffled parasols. The little republic displays more frock coats, dress-suits and stove-pipe hats in proportion to population than any other country in the world.

As one walks down the main street of Monrovia, capital of Liberia, he finds it hard to imagine that he is actually in Africa. Monrovia itself is named after a former President of the United States. This main street carries the name of Ashmun, who lies buried in New Haven, Conn. The building yonder is the "Executive Mansion," the flag above it, the STAR and Stripes.

Between the buildings you get glimpses of Stockton Creek, commemorating an officer of the United States Navy. It flows into the St. Paul River. Beyond it lies Bushrod Island, named after Bushrod Washington.

Ask this black seaman, who has just moored his boat, where he is from. "I'se from Virginia!" He means, not the state across the seas, but a settlement in Liberia. Other settlements are known as New York, New Georgia, Hartford, Lexington, Clay-Ashland, Buchanan, Greenville, Louisiana and Maryland.

THE government of Liberia is based upon that of the United States. There is a president and a congress. The country even indulged in a Declaration of Independence, all its own. And the church leaders and missionaries, many of whom are themselves negroes, have so well done their work that many less desirable American things have been barred out. The American saloon and burlesque show are lacking, drunkenness and swearing are almost unknown, and Monrovia on Sunday has the quiet of a New England town, broken only by the sound of church organs and congregational singing.

Modern ideas are not so advanced throughout Central Africa in general as they are in Liberia—yet they are present. For instance, it has been learned that soap means cleanliness. Sometimes this knowledge is a bit misapplied, as in the case of the native who was told by an explorer to fill six barrels with water, and be sure it was clean. When the explorer opened the first barrel he found the water covered with suds. He asked the native what was wrong, and was informed: "Very clean water, Master. I put soap in every barrel to make it clean." So the exploring party drank soapsuds to the end of the journey.

Of course the natives who were carried to Europe to take part in the war have taken back many new ideas. It was feared that the general effect would be bad, but this seems not to have been the case. The Superintendent of Education in Natal was able to say that he had "not heard of a single instance of unbecoming conduct on the part of a returned native laborer. On the contrary, the discipline of the army and the education through travel had rendered them more dutiful, more loyal, more useful." Contact with civilization has given them a desire for the things of modern life and progress.

THE American business man would do well to turn more attention toward Africa. Here is the world's greatest unsupplied market.

Every eighth person in the world lives in Africa. The blacks double in number every forty years; the whites every eighty years.

Nearly a quarter of all the land in the world is comprised within the African Continent. It is as far around the coast of Africa as it is around the world.

The area of Africa is big enough to include the United States, the British Isles, Germany, France, Norway, Sweden, Italy, Argentina, China, India, and have plenty of room left to throw in fifty Belgiums and half a dozen Spains.

And this vast area is not merely barren expanse or tangled brush. The soil is rich. The best alfalfa land in the world is in British East Africa. It will produce twelve crops a year. The animals reach huge proportions, as if trying to be worthy of the gigantic continent on which they live. The elephant, the hippopotamus, the rhinoceros, the giraffe and the ostrich are big because the land is rich. Texas longhorns, brought to South Africa, greatly increase in size within a few generations.

Africa has the resources with which to pay her way in the world's commerce. Her copper fields equal those of North America and Europe combined. She has five times as much undeveloped iron ore as exists in North America. She supplies half the world's gold, two-thirds of its ivory and ninety-eight per cent. of its diamonds. She produces a large share of the world's rubber, and more cocoa than any other continent.

She has 40,000 miles of river and lake navigation, a distance great enough to take one across the United States from coast to coast fourteen times. She already has 25,000 miles of railway. But if she had the same proportionate mileage as the United States, she would have a million miles of track.

THIS gigantic land is now wide open to commerce. Traders from all nations, including the United States, are taking advantage of the opportunity. American goods of all kinds are finding their way into the heart of the Dark Continent.

Our exporters do not generally realize how deep a debt of gratitude they owe to the missionary. Although the missionary's aim has been something higher than trade, yet the lands which he has made accessible to Christianity have thus also been made accessible to commerce.

In nine cases out of ten the first white man to blaze the trail in a strange country is a missionary. He goes on ahead, wins over the cannibals with rock candy and beads, and prepares the way for the trader. Missionaries did the pioneer work in Africa, the islands of the South Seas, the Pacific islands, and most of the Asiatic continent.

"I go back to Africa to try to make an open path for commerce and Christianity," said Livingstone. And along the Christian path which he opened now run automobiles and motor trucks and railway trains bearing the fabulous wealth of some of the richest commerce in the world.

Africa's secret river, the Congo, was first opened to commerce by a missionary, George Grenfell. He had a steamboat made in England, shipped to Africa, carried two hundred miles through the jungle in eight hundred packages on the heads of carriers, and laid down in the pestilential brush on the shores of the Congo. The two engineers who were to have put together the ship had died of fever in the jungle. So the missionary whipped off his coat and got busy. In three months he had built the eight hundred pieces into a ship, and the first steamboat the heart of Africa had ever known chugged up the Congo with a missionary at the wheel.

In time, a dozen steamers, all of them missionary-owned, were carrying American and English traders into the solar plexus of the Dark Continent. Then commercial steamers were put into service, and finally railways.

The annual trade of the Congo State now exceeds fifty million dollars.

The first missionaries to call upon the natives of

A native preacher delivering the Gospel message to the inhabitants of a village which shows little trace of contact with civilization. Christianity will bring a remarkable transformation, and in time real houses will replace these primitive thatched huts

Nyassaland bought a basketful of grain. The natives looked at the pretty beads that had been paid to them for the grain, and were consumed with a passion for more beads. They went out to their fields and planted and cultivated as if their lives depended upon it. Now a score of steamers are needed to carry the thousands of tons of grain to the coast, where it is reshipped to the far parts of the world.

A solitary coffee plant, obtained by a missionary from the Edinburgh Botanical Gardens and placed in the soil of Central Africa, was the progenitor of great plantations. The export of his one product amounts to thousands of tons annually, and "Scotch Coffee" has become a staple African product.

"I am teaching one of my boys to use the typewriter," wrote a missionary by name of Pilkington in Uganda. Some years later the officials of the Church Missionary Society were astonished to receive a typewritten letter from the African King Daudi of Toro. Today the American typewriter is common in Uganda.

In countries the world around the first sewing-machines have been introduced by the missionaries. No wonder one missionary says, "I can not look at the tower of the great Singer Building as I enter the harbor at New York without saying to myself, 'I helped build that tower,' for I was one of the unsalaried drummers who helped to open up the markets of the world to the sewing-machine." Today in a thatched straw hut in an African kraal one will sometimes find the only piece of furniture to be a sewing-machine.

Wherever the missionary goes there is presently a demand for shirts, collars, shoes, oil lamps, safety razors, towels and the other appurtenances of propriety. Not that the missionary insists upon collars and shoes as necessary to salvation! But the native, of his own accord, begins to desire these things. Is his desire normal? I think so. When a man becomes a Christian he wants to clean up and be decent. He buys soap. He wants to wear something besides a tattoo mark and a smile. He buys clothes. He wants to live like a man instead of a pig, in a house instead of a hut, and he works and buys and builds until he has so elevated his standard of living that all of America's first aids to civilization are demanded by him as well.

THE missionary aim is to establish Christian homes, like nerve-centers radiating energy through lazy heathen lands. And a Christian home is a civilized home, fitted up with the brooms, bathtubs and Bibles; that make a clean Christian civilization possible. Thus Christianity and Civilization create a desire for things modern and swing open the door to commerce.

American business men could afford to pay all the cost of foreign missions for the sake of the business that comes home to roost on American bank books. And yet this is all only a by-product of the missionary's work. His main job is not clothes, houses and conveniences—but bodies, minds and souls.

There is perhaps no continent more sore in body and more in need of modern medicine than Africa. In Central Africa one rarely sees an old person. The native is picked off by death long before he has had a chance to grow old.

Epidemics sweep away multitudes. In one district of Uganda, sleeping sickness reduced the population in a year from 22,000 to eight thousand. Entire villages were wiped out by the influenza epidemic in the Belgian Congo, and the number of deaths was estimated as one-eighth of the total native population.

Native medical knowledge is crude indeed. When a man has the toothache he complains, "The lion in my mouth is roaring." Some impromptu native dentist will bring an axe, place a wedge of wood against the tooth, give it a blow and dislodge the tooth, probably sending it down the patient's throat.

The witch doctor draws heavily upon superstition for his stock in trade. With his needles he will perforate the patient with many holes, in order to give opportunity for departure to the evil spirits. Or through a magic ram's horn he will whisper into his patient's ear, urging the evil spirits to go their way. Or he will declare that the patient has been bewitched by some one else in the community and insist that that person must be put to death before the sick man can be cured.

The missionary doctor meets and answers a tremendous need. An odd letter of appreciation received by a missionary board from a native was as follows:

"This doctor we call him in our native convers, 'Maker-of-people-to-be-glad.' Oh, this marvelously doctor! Why? Look at the people; these did have great sick which we could not hope that these people will be healed. But now are getting well. Is he not marvelously doctor? He is doctor of hearts too. He makes happy the unjoy hearts and makes more tenderness the durable hearts. He is a friend of babies, children, men, women, white people, and he is a friend of all people of black. Therefore I make you know that let you not fatigue to help this make-glad Doctor."

All too slowly the stethoscope is driving out the witch doctor who, in Africa, is estimated to be responsible for four million deaths a year. There is the most urgent need for missionary doctors.

EVEN more important than the healing of the body of Africa is the enlightening of the mind. Only about one per cent. of the men and one-fourth of one per cent. of the women of Central Africa are literate.

Assuming that one teacher is required for every fifty children of school age, Central Africa needs 280,000 teachers!

Not only are there whole villages in which no one can read, but there are whole tribes in which reading is as impossible as a trip to Mars, since their languages have not as yet even been reduced to writing.

Only one African tribe had a written language before the missionaries came. Now one hundred and thirty languages have been reduced to writing; but there are six hundred and seventy still to do!

Curious expedients have to be resorted to among a people with no written language. At a freight depot where the native shippers can not read, a different color is used to indicate each destination. After a shipper has learned, for example, that the color for Bo is green, he makes no bother over labels, but simply seizes everything that has been placed under the green sign and puts it aboard for Bo.

In this great unschooled continent it is no wonder that, as an official report states "The graduates of mission schools are in great demand. In the technical schools (which are all too few) the problem is to keep the pupil long enough to finish his training, as he is constantly being tempted to leave and accept the high wages offered to him for what training he already has."

Throughout Africa there is only one missionary for every 133,000 souls—so that the missionary's chief task, that of winning converts to Christianity, is a colossal one. But he does not become giddy in the face of numbers and attempt to sweep the natives into the church in multitudes. Simply calling a man a Christian does not make him one. Careful training is necessary, especially in working with such raw material as the African native. In Portuguese East Africa, for example, the native who wishes to enter the church is put on probation for a period of from three to eight years. He must abstain from toil on Sunday, put away all his wives but one, give up receiving "lobola" or the marriage dowry for his daughters, cease idolatry, heathen practices and beer-drinking, memorize the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, certain portions of Scripture and the answers to a catechism of a hundred questions. It would be hard for any man to be a lackadaisical Christian after surviving such a grilling preparation as this.

THE result is a church organization such as that in the Rand which gave in one year $2,250 for foreign missions. The result is, also, that the Church and its members have the general respect of the people.

Native chiefs are so eager for pastors-teachers that they will usually furnish necessary land for buildings, gardens, etc., erect a house for the pastor, buildings for the school and church, and lodging houses for the boys and girls. The government of Natal in 1918 gave a mission board grants of eight thousand dollars for its general work, including the building of a Domestic Science Department.

The missionary is wanted and appreciated in Africa. "The United States is known in Africa," says an explorer, "by its Chicago windmills and its sewing-machines; by its Boston rum and its Standard oil; by its Virginia tobacco and its mining machinery; but mainly by its schoolhouse and dispensaries. The American missionary is the widest and most favorably known of all our exports."

That is a worth-while tribute to the churches of America and to the heroic souls they have sent out to labor for the redemption of a continent.

Another New York idea in the African jungle. Perhaps it's not the very latest model, but these black belles do not care

A Year Under Prohibition

NATIONAL Prohibition has just rounded out its initial year. Those who anticipated the complete overthrow of the liquor traffic under the operation of the prohibitive constitutional amendment now see how far they misjudged the situation. On the other hand, those who have studied the problem in its various aspects calmly and judiciously will find substantial reason for satisfaction in the progress made.

No great reform was ever completely carried through in a single campaign. In the first year of Prohibition we have had to encounter the liquor forces in their greatest strength in the actual fighting field. They have now been checked and their solid fronts broken and somewhat demoralized; but they are still fighting, and capable of giving a good deal of trouble. Just as our enemies in the Great War resorted to methods condemned by civilization, so the hosts of alcohol are now fighting desperately with criminal weapons. But it is a conflict that can have but one ending, and that is complete subjugation of the law-breakers. Meanwhile, Prohibition's forces, strengthened and made veterans by their experience of twelve months of conflict, are entering upon the second stage of the great campaign of national sobriety with full confidence of success.

We learn by experience, and the year of campaign has taught us several things that are of the greatest consequence. First and foremost, traitors and temporizers must be weeded out of the official ranks of Prohibition enforcement. Second, the people themselves, to whom we have a right to look for the fullest support, must be made to understand clearly that prohibition is a national law which must be obeyed, and that it is entitled to all the active support they are capable of giving the officials in their campaign for general enforcement. Third, the press, too, does not yet seem to clearly realize that the indifference of many journals helps to encourage the lawless element.

AS GOVERNOR MILLER of New York has justly said in his recent message: "We shall never know until we have Prohibition whether we want it or not." At present it is flouted and evaded; but it is on the statute books to be enforced. He believes in a State law, maintaining the Volstead Act and making State enforcement thorough enough to command respect. Loosely enforced, it is respected by nobody, whereas if firmly enforced, we can learn how it works out and whether it is satisfactory or not. If the Federal authorities are incapable of compelling enforcement, it will become the duty of the States to supplement their efforts and end present intolerable conditions.

No one who is familiar with the general situation and with the resources of a strongly entrenched traffic expected smooth sailing at the outset. Consequently, nobody was surprised that there should have been trouble with the saloons, the distilleries, the secret traffickers in drink, and with that considerable faction of the American people who are classed as regular drinkers. It has been a year of skirmishes, raids, prosecutions and seizures; of border smuggling and of criminal combinations formed by devotees of the outlawed business in their frantic attempts to override the law.

All the hardships of the campaign, however, do not seem to have discouraged the officials most interested in carrying enforcement through. Prohibition Commissioner Kramer, taking a broad view of the field, pronounces the situation most encouraging, and believes that enforcement will now become easier, and that the former drinking element will grow reconciled to the new saloonless age. The country is learning to go dry. It does not take a long period of training to make the average man understand that Prohibition has come to stay. So we find in the statement of Internal Revenue Commissioner Williams evidence of "a constantly growing sentiment on the part of the people for a strict enforcement of the law."

During the twelve months nearly 30,000 distilleries and "stills" have been destroyed, 20 breweries and 50,000 fermenters seized, and nearly 25,000 violators arrested, while the fines, penalties and taxes levied have aggregated nearly $22,000,000. But all of this together has not appreciably lessened drinking, for the total liquor withdrawals of the year from bonded warehouses are estimated at 43,000,000 gallons, which shows conclusively that the national thirst is still unabated. There will be a marked improvement from now on in the direction of sobriety, the enforcement officials assure us.

In New York City, as the figures show, Prohibition has been openly and secretly violated throughout the year. Hundreds of bars and scores of restaurants have sold liquor, some openly, but the majority under cover. People of wealth have been able to set it lavishly on their tables, and in many average households, "home brew" has been substituted for public drinking. Arrests for intoxication exceeded those of the preceding year by several hundred. In a modified degree, similar conditions prevailed throughout the State. Federal Prohibition Director O'Connor attributes conditions in New York State largely to confusion in the minds of the people, a certain element refusing to regard the law as equally binding with other laws. The dealers, knowing this, seized the opportunity to make enormous profits, defrauding the Government and the people to an extent hitherto unknown. He feels confident that the future will show much more efficiency in enforcement, and that the worst is over and ultimate success assured.

PROHIBITION deserves more generous treatment from the American press than it has yet received. It has been flouted and belittled by shallow thinkers who did not appreciate the wholesome sentiment that pervaded the nation in its favor, doubtless their own readers among the rest. A clearer realization of the whole question, in its beneficial aspects to the country, would change this mistaken attitude.

It was Wayne Wheeler of the Anti-Saloon League who gave to the liquor traffic the name of being "the most lawless in the nation." It is checked, but not throttled. New organizations backed by large capital have been formed to oppose Prohibition. The deciding conflict has not yet taken place, but this year may see it through. No great reform has ever been accomplished without a tremendous struggle. The conflict now progressing in the United States is being watched keenly in other lands. All the forces favorable to liquor, both here and abroad, may be expected to rally this year to overthrow Prohibition. Its triumphant working out in America would mean a world defeat to the enemies of law and order everywhere, as it would influence the issue in other lands. It is a reform that can not be defined by geographical lines. Wholly apart from social, economic and moral considerations, it has a spiritual outreach that is limitless. A sober American, in the opinion of the great mass of thoughtful and observant men here and elsewhere, would ultimately become the forerunner of a sober world!

Useless Expenses

EVERY sensible American citizen must commend President-elect Harding for using his influence to cut down the needless expenses of the Inaugural exercises for the induction into office of the President of the United States.

It is reported that the platform and decorations for the exercises on the steps of the Capitol building at Washington sometimes cost over $50,000. If this is true, it is an illustration of how not to do it. The inaugural "balls" that are a feature of the inauguration of state governors often are a disgrace instead of an honor to the State that takes the people's money and uses it, or rather wastes it, in senseless display, and worse. At one of the state functions some years ago a ballet was introduced, adding insult to abuse of state funds.

A member of the governor's staff of a certain State was notified by the reception committee that had charge of the ceremonies of inauguration that he would have to wear a certain uniform if he remained on the staff, a position which he supposed was simply an honorary one. When he went to be measured for his "uniform" he found that a sword was also included in the outfit. And a cocked hat! And the entire display, made of the finest material that the tailor's art and the swordman's skill could command, amounted to $250.

The member of the staff did not balk at the price of the uniform, nor even at the cocked hat, although he said he looked and felt like a fool for paying for the one, and wearing the other. But it was the "sword" that finally decided him to declare his independence as an American citizen. He said it was bad enough for a man who was an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and in good and regular standing, to lead the grand march across a slippery wax floor at a "ball" with the governor's wife in décolleté dress clinging to his arm, but when it came to wearing a "sword" that he knew would get tangled up in his legs in front of the assembled beauty and fashion of Foolville, he was ready to hand in his resignation as a member of the governor's staff.

Isn't it about time the American people stopped wearing the old habiliments of royalty and the old obsolete trappings of "Swordom?" And also isn't it about time that the foolish and wicked waste of official receptions to public officers where unnecessary food is gobbled and absurd clothing is worn is dispensed with? A salute of seventeen guns ushered in the inauguration of many of the state governors when they took office this year. Seventeen is, we believe, the regular prescribed number of shots to be fired for a governor. The cost of each shot is—(look it up with the authority and see how much a shot). It may seem like a big fuss over a small thing, but if twenty governors were inaugurated this year the sum total of expense for needless salutes would keep several starving children alive. (Look it up, and see how much.) But for the matter of that the $700,000,000 that the American people spend every year on perfumes and face paint would buy a number of meals for the starving bodies of humanity. But what is the use of making a fuss about a little matter like that? The outside of the sepulcher must be kept looking polished up. What would this great and glorious Republic look like if the perfumery and cosmetics were to be lost out of civilization!

A Railroad Comparison

WHEN the railroads of this country are criticized for the high passenger and freight rates, they come back at the shipper and the traveler with a business statement like the following: A well-known Western road gives these figures on the cost and maintenance of railroad locomotives now, as compared with the year 1912:

	1912
Average cost.....	$21,000
Value of coal consumed per month per locomotive owned.....	364
Operating cost per month per locomotive owned.....	678
Cost of keeping in condition per month per locomotive owned.....	205
	1920
Average cost.....	$72,800
Value of coal consumed per month per locomotive owned.....	743
Operating cost per month per locomotive owned.....	1,506
Cost of keeping in condition per month per locomotive owned.....	890

These are certainly interesting figures as to cost of building and maintaining the "iron horse." The shipper and traveler would be interested, as time goes on under private ownership of railroads, to learn whether the great increase in rates will not more than meet this great increase in railroad expense.

What Ails Kansas?

"KANSAS," says a newspaper in that State, "is spending more than twenty-three times as much for luxuries as for higher education, according to estimates based on internal revenue statistics."

"Annual expenditures by the people of Kansas for certain items listed as 'non-necessities' follow:

"Cigars, cigarettes and tobacco.....	$35,400,000
"Theater and motion picture tickets.....	8,273,300
"Jewelry.....	5,134,160
"Soft drinks, ice-cream, etc.....	4,860,420
Total.....	$53,667,880

"This total is more than three times the amount spent in 1918 for all public schools, rural and city, including high schools—$17,070,394. The state appropriations for higher education, including the university, the agricultural college and the three normal schools, totaled $2,378,130 for 1919-20. The appropriation for the university alone was $875,730.

"To show further the ability of the State to pay for higher education, it is pointed out that Kansas ranks tenth in the list of forty-eight States with a per capita wealth of $2,652. Kansas has no indebtedness."

A general impression has gone out that Kansas had a rather high opinion of herself as a moral example to the rest of mankind. How about that, Kansas! The above cold figures from Uncle Sam's book-keeping do not look good. What ails Kansas?

Yes. And what ails Missouri and New York and California and about 47 other States besides Kansas? Speak up, United States! Is your record any better than Kansas? What ails all of us, anyhow?

Germany Must Disarm and Pay, New French Premier Declares

ARISTIDE BRIAND, the new French Premier, in presenting the policy of his government to Parliament, laid chief emphasis on demands that Germany disarm and pay the reparations due from her. He did not tell how and what the new ministry would attempt to make Germany pay, questions to which the French people have been demanding answers, but inasmuch as his statement was made only a few days before the opening of conferences on the reparations issue he was waiting to discuss matters with Premier Lloyd George before deciding on a definite policy. British and French sentiment has been widely at variance, and an attempt will be made to reach accord regarding the treatment of Germany.

France has the force to compel respect for engagements taken with her, and would be able to use it if necessary, M. Briand warned, but desires to induce Germany, by peaceful means, to fulfil her obligations.

Premier Briand declared the imperishable bonds between France and America formed on the battlefields will "guarantee our union in peace and in war," and added: "We are sure our American friends will give us for the reparation of the damages we sustained the same support that decided the victory in the great war." Another declaration of particular interest to Americans was regarding the attitude of the United States toward the League of Nations: "We respect the scruples which made them hesitate to indorse a given League of Nations, of which, however, they have never doubted the generous and beneficent principles."

The Premier said peace with Turkey must be made effective, account being taken of new circumstances, which statement was interpreted as being in line with the recent tendency of the Allies to modify the Treaty in favor of Turkey. He promised that France would not intervene in the internal affairs of Russia, but said France could not permit the Bolshevik armies to cross the Russian frontiers and attack France's allies—declarations which aroused the greatest enthusiasm of his auditors.

Interpellations showed that the new Premier would have to conduct his government with the greatest skill in order to hold the support of a majority of the Deputies. The speeches were directed obviously toward stiffening his attitude in the conferences with the British Premier and toward a sterner policy against Germany.

Army Cut to 175,000 Ordered

THE growth of sentiment for a curtailment of military and naval expenditures was shown by the adoption by Congress of a joint resolution directing Secretary Baker to discontinue recruiting until the enlisted personnel of the regular army had been reduced to 63½ per cent of the authorized strength, which means a standing army of not more than 175,000, exclusive of the 18,000 officers allowed under the army reorganization. In the House there was virtually no opposition, the vote in favor of the reduction standing 285 to 4. In the Senate the fight was over the extent of the cut to be made, rather than over the advisability of reducing the regular forces. Earlier the Senate had adopted a resolution ordering a cut to an enlisted strength of 150,000 and several senators strenuously opposed increasing this figure, so that the final vote was 41 to 32.

The joint resolution was sent to President Wilson, who delayed action on it. General Pershing was quoted as opposing any reduction below 200,000, because of present world conditions.

Discussion of a world conference on disarmament continued and it was predicted Mr. Harding would issue a call for such a conference immediately after his inauguration. The plan was to make the call so broad as to permit consideration of the setting up of an international tribunal for the judicial settlement of disputes between nations as a part of the movement to make disarmament possible.

The recall of Sir Auckland Geddes, British Ambassador to the United States, for conferences with Premier Lloyd George was declared to be concerned directly with the disarmament question, the British Government desiring to have first-hand information on the progress of the campaign in this country and the extent to which the American Government might be expected to participate in a movement to curtail armaments.

Senator Borah's resolution regarding naval disarmament was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs after being amended so as to call for the prompt negotiation of a treaty by the United States, Great Britain and Japan, under which these governments would agree to begin at once the reduction of their naval programs. Some observers doubted that action on the resolution would be obtained at this session.

Harding Delays Cabinet Decisions

PRESIDENT-ELECT HARDING has abandoned his plan to make public his selections for Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury and has decided to tender no cabinet posts definitely until he has completed his slate. Announcement of this fact on the eve of his leaving Marion for a twelve-day cruise in Florida waters was coupled with a declaration that no cabinet

FRANCE'S NEW PREMIER
Aristide Briand, veteran of French politics, has assumed the difficult task of piloting the nation

Secretary of State, which had been regarded as almost a certainty, and were urging Elihu Root for the place. They had objected to Mr. Root on the ground that he was committed to the League of Nations, but preferred him to Mr. Hughes, whose campaign speeches have shown a favorable disposition toward the League, although he has attacked certain clauses vigorously.

House Increase Defeated

THE House of Representatives, after a stormy debate, overturned the recommendation of the Census Committee that its membership be increased to 483 and voted to retain the present figure of 435. The final vote showed 276 opposing an increase in membership, and only 77 favoring it. The most effective arguments were that the House already was so large as to be unwieldy, and that the addition of 48 members would increase its expenses by about $1,000,000 a year. An effort to amend the reapportionment bill to provide for 460 members was defeated by a vote of 189 to 55, while a proposal to cut the membership to 307 was killed by a vote of 203 to 27.

The reapportionment made necessary by the new census will result in a loss of representatives by eleven states and a gain by eight states, the new ratio of representation being 242,267 persons instead of 218,979. Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, Nebraska, Rhode Island and Vermont will lose one representative each, while Missouri will lose two. Connecticut, New Jersey, North Carolina, Texas and Washington will gain one representative each, Michigan and Ohio will gain two each, and California three.

Each state whose membership was changed must work out the problem of redistricting for itself, an amendment to expedite the redistricting process having been defeated.

Navy Investigates Balloon Flight

THE flight of the naval balloon A-5598 from the outskirts of New York City to the shores of Hudson Bay and incidents of the return of the three aeronauts have been the subject of an exhaustive inquiry by a naval court appointed by Secretary Daniels. An attack by Lieutenant Stephen A. Farrell on Lieutenant Walter Hinton, because of the publication of a letter which the latter had written to his wife, had cast a shade over the entire exploit and made certain the holding of an inquiry. The officers later appeared reconciled, and navy medical officers testified that Lieutenant Farrell was suffering from "exhaustion psychosis," similar to shell shock, as the result of the sufferings he underwent during the four days the party wandered without shelter and almost without food through the frozen wilderness of the north.

Orders issued by the commandant of the air station had authorized the flight, which had no purpose beyond the training of the officers and on which they set out without equipment for a landing in the wilds. The officers could have come down at Wells, N. Y., without difficulty, but all favored continuing the flight through the night as was customary, and thus were caught by the storm which carried them several hundred miles north.

Lieutenant Hinton lost twenty-one pounds during their wanderings, but Lieutenant A. L. Kloor, the youngest of the party, stood the exposure well. Lieutenant Farrell was able to appear before the court, but obviously was ill, and testified he had no memory of striking Lieutenant Hinton.

To Tighten Prohibition Enforcement

HOPE for a stricter enforcement of national prohibition in New York City, where violations of the law have been notorious, have been strengthened by the manifest determination of Governor Miller, who recently assumed office, to employ the full strength of the state government in behalf of law and order. The governor has given his support to the passage of a state enforcement measure in line with the Volstead Act and to replace legislation which frankly was intended to promote a "liberal" interpretation of the prohibition statutes.

matters would be settled until he returned to St. Augustine early in February. Incidentally, Mr. Harding revealed something of the difficulties he is experiencing in arranging matters.

"I had thought originally to name two or three places of the Cabinet in advance," the President-elect told the correspondents in Marion, "to permit the parties named to take up informally the work that is to be theirs. But I have found it so difficult to fit in an administrative organization that I am not disposed to make definite tenders and have men accept until I myself have made up a complete organization. There is no semblance of any marked drive either for or against, either in support of or in opposition to, any individual. There is the natural current of both political and personal recommendations and the natural cross-currents of personal, individual and factional opposition. . . . I believe in party government, and I am going to have a Republican cabinet, but no selection will be made because of party organization without consideration for the best service of the country."

Senators were expressing their opposition to the proposed selection of Charles E. Hughes for

The Thirst of the Soul

A Sermon by REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—John 7:38. "If any man thirst let him come unto Me and drink."

IF ANY man thirst." How intense is the figure! There is nothing more intolerable than thirst. The burden of thirst is more oppressive than the pangs of hunger. In thirst the whole body is affected, and all the tissues crave in sympathy. Every solid and every fluid of the body contains water, and to diminish this element is to create a depression of the whole system.

Common experience abounds in illustrations of the fierceness of this particular craving. In the South African War the English regiments more than once almost broke the bands of discipline in the eagerness to quench their thirst. A recent book of travels, describing adventures in Thibet, depicts the terrific domination of a prolonged thirst. And it is this figure, so ardent, so intense, so ferocious, so imperative, which our Saviour uses to express the soul's craving after God and the things of eternal peace. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O Lord!" Without God we are only desert pilgrims whose water has run quite out! There is nothing before us and round us but leagues of glowing and irritating sand!

Without God, the soul is divorced from its destined satisfaction, and it is constrained into feverish and fruitless quest. We become the victims of endless delusion. We turn here and there on the fond assumption that we discern the water we crave, but the deep-seated thirst remains unslaked. The thirst-stricken becomes the victim of the mirage, and the artless deception is added to the pangs of our already burdensome need.

I remember a passage in Kinglake's "Eothen" which is symbolic of other planes than those which it describes: "About this part of my journey I saw the likeness of a fresh-water lake. I saw, as it seemed, a broad sheet of calm water, stretched far and wide towards the south, stretching deep into winding creeks, and hemmed in by jutting promontories, and shelving off on the shallow side. On its bosom the reflected fire of the sun lay playing, and seeming to fall upon waters deep and still. It was not till the spongy feet of my camel had almost trodden the seeming waters that I could undeceive my eyes." It was only "a white saline deposit," the minute crystals of which "sparkled in the sun," and "so looked like the face of a lake that is calm and smooth."

ISAY that this experience has been repeated in the realms of the spirit. The mirage exercises its delusive ministry upon the soul. I have heard the thirst-stricken declare that, when the burdensome days of toil are over and they have acquired a competence, they will settle down to the enjoyment of a retired peace! And I know how frequently they have found the pool to be only "a saline deposit." They have retired into deeper weariness and unrest. They have got what they aimed at, but not what they need. And so they trudge along from one allurement to another, with increasing satisfaction, and with deeper weariness and woe. And this is the plaint of these thirsty souls, to the end of the long and feverish day, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit." "I thirst!"

Now, the New Testament provides us with many types of the thirsty soul, in order that we may learn that they are found among all classes. There is Nicodemus, "a man of the Pharisees," a "ruler of the Jews," a man with all the externals of a noble gentleman, separated in his very name from the common herd as by a mountain range! And this man, punctilious to a scruple in ceremonials, comes to Jesus "by night," and we all know the coming was a quest for water! And there is Matthew the publican "sitting at the receipt of custom." He is making money and making it fast, and it lies around him like the yellow sands of the desert. I know now how many times the Lord had looked into his outwardly prosperous but inwardly weary and thirsty life. Every time the Lord passed him at his post, He could see in his eyes the glare of an unquenched fire. Our Saviour could see that while he was grasping for money the soul was thirsting for peace. Matthew was in the the experiences of our modern life. Sometimes the thirst enshrines itself in strange expressions. It often lies hidden in most deceptive appearance. Sometimes it wears the delusive guise of depression; there is no intensity about it, no apparent eagerness, no quest, almost a calm indifference; and yet at the very core of the indifference there is a thirst like a blazing fire. At other times the thirst evinces itself in a life of fastness and forced gaiety. The thirst-stricken soul will often resort to anything, rather than to sit down and think. And so they go on and on, passing from sensation to sensation, seeking for a still more glaring gaiety, plunging into artificial hilarity, and their laugh often rings out loud and blatant in the very midst of the hot and wearying sands. Such is the thirst our Master came to slake.

Now let us turn to the spring of satisfaction. "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me." Let us pause to mark the vastness of the claim. It is in these natural imperatives that our Lord proclaims His divinity. There is no feverish vehemency about it; it is all said with quiet and unobtrusive naturalness. Here is the peasant of Galilee, the carpenter of Nazareth, standing up in the Temple surrounded by the scholars of His day, gazed upon by the spiritual aristocracy, admired by the common people, and looking into the hearts of every class, and reading their inmost secrets, and interpreting their manifold cravings and desires, He calmly and confidently says to each and all, "If any man thirst let him come unto Me!"

I say, note the vastness of it! It is not a sectional ministry He offers: His calm is universal. He offers satisfaction to any man for every need! This is not a medicinal spring suited only to separate elements; it is a spring for "all the ills that flesh is heir to." If any man thirst for life, let him come unto Me! If any man thirst for truth, let him come unto Me! If any man thirst for love, let him come unto Me! If any man thirst for purity, for clean, sweet, wholesome vitality, let him come unto Me!

There is something heartening about the very tone of the invitation, calming to the fears and invigorating to one's hope.

LET him come unto me and drink." And what is it to drink? Shall I put it in this way? We must first of all come to Him, recognizing that He is a specialist in the affairs of the soul. Nay, more than that, we must come to Him recognizing that He is the specialist, the one expert in matters of life and living. That is the first requisite in all acceptable approach.

And, secondly, we must come to Him recognizing that He has got what we most need. The life we seek, Jesus had! The truth we seek, Jesus had!

Now see the amazing issue of it all. Let me take the two extremes of the great passage. Take the first extreme: "If any man thirst!" Now take the other extreme: "Out of Him shall flow rivers of living water." And between the two there is the act of drinking! The once thirsty becomes himself a fountain! The lifeless becomes a vitalizer! Out of the depressed and impotent go streams of sanctified power. The man who is in Christ receives the waters of life so abundantly that he overflows in gracious healing influences.

Surely the promise is magnificent! We find no transient pool, but an abiding spring, and the joy of the Lord is our strength.

desert, and hoping every day to find a pool, and the speechless cry of his heart was just this, "I thirst!"

And there was the woman at the well, daily fetching material water, but in her dry and ashen soul, craving for the satisfaction which material things could never bring. When the Lord saw her come to the well He knew by the weariness of her trudge that she was a woman of double quest, and that the hidden want was incomparably the keener of the two. Her face had become hardened into flippancy by the scorn and cynicism of her old friends. But the Lord could see behind the mask to the clamoring silence of her soul. She came to the well with her pitcher, and her soul was gazing for the springs.

And was it not even so with the sick of the palsy? His friends thought they were bringing only an enslaved body, but they were unconsciously bringing a soul possessed by an intolerable thirst. And it was to the thirst that our Lord first addressed His healing and satisfying ministry. But He did not heal the body until the spirit had been emancipated! "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee!"

And so the New Testament provides multiplied examples of men and women who are thirsting for the pools beyond the desert, and these New Testament types are confirmed by

The Things Above

SUNDAY. Col. 2:17. "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above." We are in a very deadly state when we are conscious of nothing above us, nothing alluring to greater heights, nothing that is still beyond our reach. That was the deadly condition of the Pharisee in our Lord's parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. He had no vision of anything above him. He wrapped his soul in self-complacency. He assumed that he had reached the topmost peak, and there was nothing beyond. In his prayer there was no upward look. In his heart he heard no bugle peal of upward calling. His only attitude was one of looking down. "I thank Thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, or even as this publican."

There is no noble hunger in this man's worship, there is only an ignoble satisfaction with himself. There is no eager, aching aspiration in his soul; there is only an indolent contentment. There is no sense of want. There is nothing above. He has everything. He has arrived!

Now, in a certain very real way we may regard our spiritual appetite as the index of our spiritual health. If a man's longings are strong and lusty, it is a sign of his robustness. If his longings and desires are dull and feeble, or if they have passed into apathy and indifference, it is a sure proof of spiritual weakness and disease. Vigorous desire for the things which are above is the certain promise of their possession. "My soul thirsteth for Thee as in a dry and thirsty land where no water is!" "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God."

The intensity of the craving is the pledge of our attainment. When every new elevation we occupy brings into sight a peak beyond, and we long to climb it, and we set out upon the quest, our path is as a shining light which shineth more and more even unto perfect day. And therefore do we need to cultivate the upward look. Especially do we need to cultivate the Godward look. "I saw the Lord, high and lifted up!"

That is the radiant vision which makes all attainment seem dim, and fills us with the sense of want. It reveals the things which are above. It unveils untrodden heights of glory. It makes us feel that, however much we may have in hand, our treasure is in heaven.

I think there are degrees of difficulty in ascending the steep gradient of the spiritual life. Perhaps the easiest part of the road is when we begin to abhor that which is evil and cleave to that which is good. I am not saying it is easy; I am only saying that it is easier as compared with other parts of the road. Many folk get over that part of the journey who fail later on. It may be difficult to pass from the bad to the good; but it is more difficult to pass from the good to the better. We become satisfied with the good. We are willing to let well alone. We lie down in the pleasant arbor half way up the hill, and we go to sleep.

But I think it is still more difficult to pass from the better to the best, and to hear and follow the call of the excellent. We are very reluctant to sacrifice the pearls we have for the pearl of great price. We become spiritually self-satisfied. The narcotic of attainment puts us to sleep. We lose consciousness of the things which are above. And therefore it behooves us to cultivate the upward look, the soaring prayer; the sacred ambition, which will not be satisfied until we awake in God's likeness. J. H. J.

The Great Mistakes of Life

MONDAY. James, 4:14. "For what is your life?" There are moments when one reviews the pathway of the past and the possible journeyings of the future. Napoleon on the island of St. Helena reached such a pivotal point in his career. It was there he viewed some of the great mistakes in his life. He saw the greatness of Christ and the littleness of himself. Standing on that lonely island, with his hands behind his back, gazing at the deep, dark waters of the solemn sea, he reviewed his brief but momentous life, comparing it with the life of the Saviour.

Jesus lived and died for others while Napoleon had lived for self and ambition. His many mighty victories in battle failed to comfort him now. The buried millions of soldiers seemed to rise up to condemn him, while other millions of living sang a song of sorrow in his ears.

He saw that Christ, the Prince of Peace, was growing stronger in the love and regard of mankind; that millions today would die for Him, though He had passed away eighteen centuries before. And Napoleon said to himself, "Alexander and Caesar and I founded great empires upon force, but Jesus alone founded His empire upon love. No other human is like the Saviour of the world; He is more than a man. I must be visibly present to electrify my soldiers, but Christ's influence stretches across the chasm of the centuries. He asks for the human heart for Himself and forthwith the demand is granted. Time, the great destroyer is powerless to extinguish the sacred flame of love in believing hearts. This proves to me the divinity of Jesus Christ."

We may believe that this great general of armies, this wonderful intellect, saw at last, though too late, that the true way to win men and build empires was by loving and serving them, rather than by crushing and killing. No doubt at this time he thought of the wife who had faithfully loved him, but whom his great ambition led him to put away for another. He then realized that when he lost love, he lost empires, power and everything that was dear to his ambition.

My Contribution to Humanity

TUESDAY. Thess. 18:37. "To this end was I born . . . that I should bear witness unto the truth." The world is a great judgment hall. Jesus is still on trial and His truth is also on trial. One of the weakest things a Christian can do is to make Jesus the subject of mere controversy. The effective thing is to bear witness to the truth as it is in God. And we can not bear witness beyond our own personal experience. Every time we act like Jesus, we bear witness to the truth. Every time we speak like Jesus we bear witness. The power of Jesus is estimated by its effect in human lives. If we desire to bear witness to His power, we must manifest His presence in our lives.

We never know what moment or how unexpectedly we may be called upon to bear witness to our dependence on Him.

We sometimes talk about defending the old truths; as though truth needed to be defended. If we will only testify to the truth, and give it a fair chance it will defend itself and us, too. Truth ably vindicates its own claims.

"To bear witness to the truth"—this was the life objective big enough to fill the horizon of Jesus Christ. No one can leave the world just as he found it. It is inevitable that every man makes the world better or worse. The contribution which we are making to humanity will count for tears and pain through all coming time, unless it counts for comfort and peace. To bear witness to the truth, as it is in God, is man's highest contribution. Go rend aside the veil that obscures the person of Jesus, to reveal the truth about the Cross through all the centuries perverted, suppressed and juggled with. It is time that "truth crushed to earth shall rise again"; but we, as Christians, should be active in its liberation.

We have no power to make a better world, except as we witness to the truth about God, and this we cannot do much beyond our personal experience.

Love of Liberty

WEDNESDAY. Isa. 60:22. "The small one shall become a strong nation." In 1608 an armistice was declared by Philip III., which closed a weary century of war. In that war Holland, with her insignificant three millions had stood unswervingly against Spain for the inalienable rights of men two centuries before France wrote them in blood upon her walls or America sounded them forth in the clear notes of the Independence Bell.

The men of Holland had fought their campaign to a finish. Carlyle wrote: "The Dutch are a strong people." They raised their land out of a marsh and went on, for a long time, breeding cows and making cheese; and might have gone on with their cows and cheese until doomsday. But Spain came over and said "We want you to believe in Saint Ignatius." "Very sorry," replied the Dutch, but we can't. "Aye, but you must," said Spain. And they went about it with guns and swords to make them believe in Saint Ignatius. Never made them believe in him, but did succeed in breaking their own vertebral column and raising the Dutch into a great nation."

In our country's history three names emerge above all others as representative of the broad and vital principles on which the Republic rests: to wit: Washington, Lincoln and Roosevelt. Let Americans of English blood be proud of Washington; let those who trace their lineage to Scotland speak reverently of Lincoln; the sons and daughters of Holland on their part will ever be thanking God for their kinship with Theodore Roosevelt. His name alone, were there none other to show for the influence of the Dutch forefathers, would be ample proof that it had not "vanished into thin air."

The Joy of the Liberal Heart

THURSDAY. Luke 6:38. "Give and it shall be given unto you." Giving to the starving people of China and Europe will be like grain sown at the flood of the River Nile; it will return to you after many days in harvests of pleasure and prosperity.

Maeterlinck's Bluebird is an allegory of the child's Pilgrim Progress in ministering to others. Two children are sent forth to find the bluebird which a sick child needs to make her well and happy again. Searching everywhere, they never found the right bluebird. On returning home, Tytyl says, "I will give her my dove." As he takes it from the cage, he cries out, "Hullo! Why, he's blue; much bluer than when we went away. This is the bluebird we were looking for and he was here all the time."

When happiness is sought for self, it is never really found; the true principle is to lose our life and find it again when we share our treasures with another's need. Joy is in doing good as Jesus did, ministering, saving and blessing mankind. Luxuries and selfish pleasures never made a hero. Chasing after fashion, wealth, and the honors of the world never satisfy the soul; they wither and die when caught. The real bird of Paradise is in your own soul, when you are willing to give to help suffering humanity. The real fountain of joy is within you, when you open the door for your Lord's indwelling. Then, like Him, you will give to live, you will become poor, making many rich; having nothing, yet possessing all things, you will find your real self by following His example of self-sacrifice.

So many are like the man who sold his farm to search for diamonds, while acres of diamonds were found by the man who purchased the property. Surrendering all to Jesus, we find all in Him and He helps us to find his needy children all over the world.

Acquainted with Jesus

FRIDAY. John, 12:21. "Sir, we would see Jesus." These men who came to Jesus were Greek proselytes to Judaism. They had come to worship at the Passover, expecting a warm welcome from the religious leaders, but evidently receiving a cold reception. They heard of Jesus; that He was the Friend of the overworked and overburdened. Constrained partly by curiosity, partly by a great heart-hunger, they came seeking Him. Philip bore a Greek name; here was a point of contact. To Philip they said, "Sir, we would see Jesus." Philip and Andrew introduced them to the Master. Every Christian is a debtor to his fellows, asked or unasked, to introduce Jesus. Jesus is big enough to be introduced into every social, business and political assembly in the world. And once properly introduced, He will determine the character of the discussion, direct the energies of the movement and captivate the hearts of those who hear his voice.

Some people think that religion is a nice philosophy to prattle about over the tea-cups of an afternoon. But religion, in its last analysis, is Jesus. No one is religious who has not seen Jesus. H. P. H.

The Record in the Heart

SATURDAY. II Cor. 3:2. "Ye are our epistles . . . written in our hearts." The other day a philosopher aged five plucked me by the sleeve as she was setting out for kindergarten, saying, "When Jesus said, 'Lo, I am with you always,' He meant that He would walk with me to school, didn't He?" Of course He did! And, my friends, when He said, "Except ye become as this little child ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven," He meant that, too. For heaven is simply the fruition of faith. But alas, we grow away from faith as we travel worldward; growing down as we "grow up"; forgetting our visions in the whirl of business; losing our wings, like Phobus, as we recklessly drive our self-reliant chariots into the blaze of the sun.

Let us write our visions, therefore, in a book of remembrance if we would be "living epistles known and read of all men"; in other words, so that men beholding our walk and conversation shall bear witness that we have seen the White Christ and learned of him. For faith without works is dead. To part company with the Lord when we rise from His table is to affront the sacrament. If Amen at the close of our prayer means Farewell, then "Lord, teach us how to pray!" The book in which we write our visions must be published to the world, else it would be no better than a rejected manuscript. There is "a Gospel according to you"; and it is the best seller in the book markets of the world today. And it will be selling long after its author is dead and forgotten.

CHAPTER XVI

THERE was eagerness—and a hint of something else—in Jim's voice as he repeated his question.

"Well," he asked for the second time, "what d'yer say about it—huh? How'd yer like ter marry me?"

Rose-Marie's fascinated eyes were on his face. At the first she had hardly believed her ears; but her ears had evidently been functioning properly. Jim wanted to marry her—to marry her! It was a possibility that she had never dreamed of—a thought that she had never, for one moment, entertained. Jim had always seemed so utterly of another world, of another epoch, almost. He spoke a language that was far removed from her language, his mind worked differently—even his emotions were different from her emotions. He might have been living upon another planet, so distant he had always seemed from her. And yet he had asked her to marry him!

Like every other normal girl, Rose-Marie had thought ahead to the time when she would have a home and a husband. She had dreamed of the day when her knight would come riding—a visionary, idealized figure, always, but a noble one! She had pictured a hearth-fire, and a blue-and-white kitchen, with aluminum pans and glass baking-dishes. She had even wondered how tiny fingers would feel as they curled about her hand, if a wee head would be heavy upon her breast.

Of late her dreams, for some reason, had become a little less misty—a little more definite. The figure of her knight had been a trifle more clear cut, the armor of her imagination had given place to rough tweed suits and soft felt hats. And the children had looked at her, from out of the shadows, with wide dark eyes—almost like real children. Her thoughts had shaped themselves about a figure that was not the romantic creation of girlhood—that was strong and willing and very tender. Dr. Blanchard, had he not been mistaken upon so many subjects, would have fitted nicely into the picture!

BUT Jim—of all people, Jim! He was as far removed from the boundaries of her dream as the North Pole is removed from the South. His patent-leather hair—she could not picture it against her arm—his mouth, thin-lipped and too red. . . . She shuddered involuntarily, as she thought of it, and the man bending above her saw the shudder.

"Well," he questioned for the third time, "what about it? I'm a reg'lar guy, ain't I? How'd yer like to marry me?"

Rose-Marie moistened her lips before she answered. Her voice, when it came, was very husky.

"Why, Jim—" she said faintly, "what an idea! How did you ever come to think of it?"

The man's face was flushed. His words tumbled quickly from his unsteady mouth.

"I'm crazy about yer, kid," he said. "Crazy about yer. Don't think that bein' married t' me will mean as yer'll have ter live in a dump like this-heré—" the sweep of his arm was expressive, "fer yer won't! Yer'll have th' grandest flat in this city—anywhere yer say'll suit me! Yer'll have hats an' dresses, an' a car—if yer want it. Yer'll have everything—if yer'll marry me! What d' yer say?"

Rose-Marie's face was a study of mixed emotions—dislike struggling with incredulity for first place. The man saw the unbelief; for he hurried on before she could speak.

"Yer think that I'm like my pa was," he told her, "livin' on measly wages! Well, I ain't. Some nights I make a pile that runs inter thousands—an' it'll be all fer yer! All fer yer!"

Of a sudden, Rose-Marie spoke. She was scarcely tactful.

"How do you make all of this money, Jim?" she questioned, "do you come by it honestly?"

A dark wave of color spread over the man's face—dyeing it to an ugly crimson.

"What's it matter how I get it," he snarled, "long's I get it! What business is it of yers how I come by my coin? I ain't stagin' a investergation." And, his face softened suddenly, "an' yer wouldn't understand, anyhow! Yer only a girl—a little kid! What's it matter how I gets th' roll—long as I'm willin' ter spend it on m' sweetie? What's it matter?" He made a movement as if to take her into his arms—"What's it matter," he questioned again.

LIKE a flash Rose-Marie was upon her feet. With a swing of her body she had evaded his arms. Her face was white and drawn, but her mind was exceptionally active—more active than it had ever been in all of her life. She knew that Jim was in a difficult mood—that a word, one way or the other, would make him as easy to manage as a kitten or as relentless as a panther, stalking his prey. She knew that it was in her power to say the word that would calm him until the return of his mother and his sister. And yet she found it well-nigh impossible to say that word.

"I'm tired of deceit," she told herself, as she stepped back, in the direction of the door. "I'll not say anything to him that isn't true! . . . Nothing can happen to me, anyway," she assured herself. "This is the nineteenth century, and I'm Rose-Marie Thompson. This is a civilized country—nothing can hurt me! I'm not afraid—not while God is taking care of me!"

Jim had straightened up. He seemed, suddenly, to tower.

"Well," he growled, "how about it? When'll we be married?"

Rose-Marie raised her head gallantly.

"We won't ever be married, Jim Volsky!" she told him, and, marvelously, there was not even the suggestion of a quaver in her voice. "We won't ever be married. I'm surprised at you for suggesting it!"

The man stared at her a moment, and his eyes showed clearly that he did not quite understand.

"Yer mean," he stammered at last, "that yer t'rowing me down?"

Rose-Marie's head was still gallantly lifted.

"I mean," she said, "that I won't marry you! Please—we'll let the matter drop, at once!"

The man came a step nearer. The bewilderment was dying from his face.

"Not much, we won't let the matter drop!" he snarled. "What's yer reason fer turnin' me down—huh?"

IT WAS then that Rose-Marie made her mistake. It was then that she ceased to be tactful. But suddenly she was tired, desperately tired, of Jim's persistence. Suddenly she was too tired to be even afraid. The lift of her chin was very proud—proud with some ingrained pride of race, as she answered. Behind her stood a long line of ancestors with gentle blood, ancestors who had known the meaning of chivalry.

Coolly she surveyed Jim. Dispassionately she noticed the lack of breeding in his face, the marks of early dissipation, the lines that sin had etched. And as she looked she laughed with just the suggestion of hauteur. For the first time in her life Rose-Marie was experiencing a touch of snobbishness, of class distinction.

"We won't discuss my reason," she told him slowly, "it should be quite evident to any one!" Jim Volsky's face had turned to a dark mottled red. His slim, well-manicured hands were clenched at his sides.

"Y' mean," he questioned, and his voice had a ugly ring; "y' mean I ain't good enough fer yer?"

All at once the snobbishness had slipped, like worn coat, from the shoulders of the girl. She was Rose-Marie Thompson again, a settlement worker. She was no better, despite the ancestors with gent blood, than the man in front of her—only more fortunate. She realized that she had been not only unkind, but tactless. She tried, hurriedly—and with great scare looking out of her wide eyes—to repair the mistake that she had made.

"I don't mean that I am better than you, Jim," she said softly, "not in the matter of family. We are the children of God—we are all brothers and sist' in His sight."

Jim Volsky interrupted. "He came nearer to Rose-Marie—so near that only a few inches of floor space lay between them.

"Don't yer go sayin' over Sunday-school lesson me," he snarled, "I know what yer meant. I think I ain't good enough—t' marry yer. Well—laughed shortly, "well, maybe I ain't good enough—t' marry yer! But I guess I'm good enough t' kiss yer—" all at once his hands shot out, closed with the strength of a vise upon her arms, just above her elbows. "I guess I'm good enough t' kiss yer!" he repeated gloatingly.

ROSE-MARIE felt cold fear creeping through her veins. There was something clammy in Jim's touch, something more than menacing in his eyes. She knew that her strength was nothing to be pitted against his; she knew that in any sort of a struggle she would be easily subdued. And yet she knew that she would rather die than feel his lips upon her lips. She felt an intense loathing toward him—the loathing that some women feel toward toads and lizards.

"Jim," she said slowly and distinctly, "let go of me this instant!"

The man was bending closer. A thick lock of his heavy hair had shaken down over his forehead, giving him a strangely piratical look.

"Not much I won't," he told her. "So I ain't good enough—"

All at once Rose-Marie felt the blindness of rage—unreasoning, deadly anger. Only two things she knew—that she hated Jim and that she would not let him kiss her. She spoke sudden defiant words that surprised even herself.

"No," she told him, and her voice was hysterically high; "no, you're not good enough! You're not good enough for any decent girl! You're bad—too bad to lay your fingers upon me. You're—you're unclean! Let go of me or I'll—" her courage was oozing rapidly away, "or I'll scream!"

Jim Volsky's too-red lips were on a level with her own. His voice came thickly. "Scream, if you want to, little kid!" he said. "Scream, t' beat th' band! There ain't no one t' hear yer. Ma an' Ella an' Bennie are at the hospital—givin' pa th' once over. An' th' folks in this house are used t' yellin'. They'd oughter be! Scream if yer want to—but I'm a-goin' ter have my kiss!"

Rose-Marie could feel the warmth of his breath upon her face. Knowing the futility, the uselessness of it, she began to struggle. Desperately she tried to

TAOS, AN ARTIST'S PARADISE

Taos Pueblo is eighty-six miles north of Santa Fe, New Mexico. This is one of the most picturesque pueblos in America. The community house, which is a sort of tribal apartment house building, is one of the largest of its kind. It houses 400 people. The pueblo's picturesqueness attracts many tourists, and it has a large colony of artists from this and other countries who stay there several months in the year to paint Indian life. The pueblo is about three miles from Taos Village, which is half a day's motor ride from Taos Junction on the narrow-gauge line of the Denver & Rio Grande R. R.

Kit Carson's headquarters during the time when he was fighting Indians in that region were a short distance from Taos Village, and his tomb is there.

Here is a fine type of the Pueblo Indian woman of Isleta, New Mexico. She has about her shoulders one of the shawls woven by the Indians and on her head one of the attractive native water jars.

China Sunday Tomorrow

TOMORROW, February 6, is China Famine Sunday, set aside by agreement among the churches of practically every denomination as a day of special appeal in behalf of the famine-stricken population of Northern China. From thousands of pulpits throughout America tomorrow church-goers will hear appeals to help those who at this time are so pitifully unable to help themselves.

Famine Situation to Be Explained in Thousands of Churches

It is mainly on America that the task of saving the many millions of famine victims must devolve. European countries are doing what they can, but scared by war, facing their own acute problems, they are unable and can hardly be expected to do a great deal. China herself has risen nobly to the occasion. Her rich merchants in other parts of the country are giving generously to the relief of their unfortunate brothers of the five northern provinces, and the Chinese Government has introduced special transportation taxes, the receipts from which will be devoted to the succor of the starving.

But America must contribute without stint if the situation is to be appreciably relieved. Thought of their own economic problems should in this case only stir Americans to thankfulness that these are so infinitesimally trivial compared to the ghastly catastrophe which has overtaken a population of 45,000,000 souls in China's northern provinces.

THIS is the condition which the churches of the country are being asked to do their part towards relieving. Through the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and other religious bodies the local churches throughout the land have been asked to set aside tomorrow as a day of special appeal and prayer for the starving millions of North China. Sermons will stress the urgency of the situation; prayers will be offered in behalf of the sufferers, and collections taken up during the day will be turned over to the American Committee for China Famine Fund.

This representative Committee, as Christian Herald readers know, was appointed by President Wilson in December, with Thomas W. Lamont as Chairman. Complete arrangements have been made for the purchase of food supplies at points, notably in Manchuria, adjacent to the famine area, and monies collected are cabled to China immediately in order that not a moment may be lost. The machinery for distribution has been set up, and the actual work of relieving distress is superintended for the most part by missionaries of all denominations.

High hopes are entertained by the American Committee for China Famine Fund that the result of China Famine Sunday will be the saving of millions of lives. No efforts have been spared to impress upon the churches the urgency of the situation, and the fact that relief, to be effective, must be prompt. Robert E. Speer, President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, recently issued "An Appeal to All Christian People," which contained the following passage:

"Our giving must be prompt, generous and sustained. Ought not every church make an offering unexampled in generosity to help meet this tragic situation? Ought not every disciple of Him Who fed the hungry throngs have a share in this ministry of love in the name of Christ? Clearly this is a call from Him Who has compassion on the multitudes and says: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto Me.'"

THE latest news by mail from China to the Christian Herald office makes it clear that a magnificent response has been made to the appeal sent out for volunteer workers in the famine-stricken districts. Christian missionaries from other parts of China are flocking to the famine area and spending themselves without stint on the fight with death. Here is a portion of a letter recently received from distribution headquarters in China:

"In the matter of personal help, missionaries stand unrivalled, especially when joined by their Christian brethren. Missionary staffs in all the centers of the affected region have thrown themselves into the work with splendid devotion and energy. Men from other localities have offered their services and are tackling superhuman tasks in outlying districts, in some cases actually single-handed.

"These men have the task of receiving supplies at the railroad, checking and keeping account of quantities, arranging for and superintending transport to central 'dumps,' carrying out the distribution to sub-centers and giving out to the most needy, after careful selection, the grain tickets; superintending the cashing of these tickets at the sub-centers night by night; and tallying tickets received with food given out. And all the while they are beset with heart-rending appeals from those not yet helped, appeals hard to deny but impossible to grant.

"Your help is needed. Our force is faced with superhuman tasks. We have in mind one county, among many, where one foreign missionary is attempting to do all this, and cheerfully accepts the responsibility. His only plea is that we will promise him more grants so that he may take more villages into relief work. Already he has twenty-six distributing sub-centers, each serving five to ten villages. 'He reports to us: 'I am in the midst of it here, and I expect to live here for the next six months. Within another month I shall be surrounded by thousands of people starving to death, and they will die at my very door. Can you in any way possible do more for us here?'"

The Christian missionaries are doing all they can. They want to do more; but their ability to do it depends upon the response to their appeals for help which is given here in America.

And the need for a tremendous response is revealed by the fact that the famine area covers 100,000 square miles and embraces in whole or in part the five great provinces of Shantung, Shansi, Honan, Shensi and Chihli. The entire population is suffering privations; one-third of it, 15,000,000 people, are facing actual starvation; and reports from the scene of the catastrophe show that 10,000 or 15,000 persons are dying every day from starvation and its attendant ills.

READERS of the Christian Herald have, as always, made a generous response to the appeals addressed to them. We have already acknowledged contributions amounting to more than $300,000, and we are happy to be able to state that now the $400,000 mark is within sight. These funds have been turned over to the National Committee, and Christian Herald readers can have the satisfaction of knowing that at the moment of reading these words the money that they have generously contributed, converted into food, is actually providing meals for starving families. The last amount acknowledged as contributed to the Christian Herald fund up to January 12 was $319,869.56. Since that date the following sums have been received:

Transform the Firebell's Message of Terror To a Message of Confidence

The terrifying sound of the firebell rings out in the still of the winter's night. You spring from your bed shivering at the possibilities of fire in your community. Your town inadequately protected—your home, your business, your loved ones in danger. You think with fear of the devastating fires other towns have suffered, and paint in your own mind the terrible picture of destruction in your town.

If your town were protected in the same efficient way in which big cities are protected, by American-LaFrance Fire Apparatus mounted on a Ford chassis you would not have these fears. You would realize that any member of the fire department who could drive a Ford could drive this speedy little vehicle to the fire; that within a few seconds after its arrival a stream of "chemical" 40 times as effective as water would be playing on the fire. In a short space of time the fire would be out—all danger past—your town saved—everybody congratulating the foresighted citizens who provided the community with such thorough protection.

If an alarm means a feeling of terror for you, take steps today to protect your town from fire. Enlist the aid of other prominent citizens. Fill out the attached coupon with their names and mail it to us.

Back to the Backyard

BACK to a little piece of earth in which you can plant pure-bred seeds for a harvest of tender fresh vegetables. This is one solution of the increasing cost of foodstuffs—one doctorless cure for sleepless nights and that all-in feeling—one sure source of inspiration for the next day's work.

There's nothing more sensible—and nothing more easy. Pure-bred seeds and good cultivation are the essentials. The one you can buy "at the store around the corner" that sells Ferry's Seeds; the other you can learn from Ferry's Seed Annual.

Ferry's Seeds are rightly called "pure-bred seeds." They are the progeny of parent plants whose parents and grandparents have been carefully selected for years. Plants are like animals. Defects or virtues are handed down to the following generations. "Weeding out" is done scientifically on the great Ferry Stock Seed Gardens. There, every variety of vegetable must meet rigid tests for vitality, must duplicate the size, flavor, tenderness and productivity of the parent plant. Flowers must show their ancestral traits of color and vigor.

In this way Ferry's Seeds earn their title "pure-bred seeds." You can't afford to plant anything but the best.

The World News of the Week

Of equal importance was his announcement that he intended to hold the New York City police department responsible for the enforcement of prohibition. "It is not my duty to enforce the law in New York City," he declared, "but it is my duty to interfere with the head of the police department if the law is not enforced." Since the Governor has the power to remove the city's Police Commissioner, he can compel a tightening up of the lines against the run-runners and enlist in the fight for obedience to law forces which heretofore have been neutral. With the police of the city actively co-operating with the Federal authorities, real progress should be made toward ending the liquor traffic in the country's largest city, and toward cleaning up the surrounding districts for which it has been a source of supply.

DOMESTIC

TWO NEW YORK POLICE CAPTAINS INDICTED. Two captains of the New York police department have been indicted on the charge of accepting money from firms which desired improved police protection during strikes. Former Governor Charles S. Whitman, in charge of the inquiry, declared grafting prevailed on a scale as large or larger than in the Becker days, but consisted mostly of extortions from legitimate business firms instead of from open lawbreakers.

TOWN FORGOTTEN IN CENSUS. Census Bureau officials have just discovered that the village of Long Beach, N. Y., was overlooked in the 1920 census and that no count was made there. Its population is less than 1,000. Apparently it was the only town in the country which was missed.

GOMPERS HEADS PAN-AMERICAN LABOR. Samuel Gompers was re-elected president of the Pan-American Federation of Labor at the convention in Mexico City, after a fight in which the Mexicans, Salvadoreans and Guatemalans were allied against him. Their opposition was due to hostility against the Latin-American policy of the United States, particularly with regard to Santo Domingo.

$1,000,000 GIFT FOR NEEDY. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has announced a gift of $1,000,000 to the proposed $33,000,000 fund for the relief of destitute women and children of Europe.

FOREIGN

TROOPS BLOW UP HOUSES IN CORK. Crown forces in Cork blew up two large business houses because it was alleged shots had been fired at the police from them. A police patrol in County Clare was ambushed and five of its members killed.

BRITISH REDUCE ARMY IN INDIA. The British Government has decided to demobilize several Indian regiments, with a total of 30,000 men and 2,500 British officers, and has been considering the withdrawal of several British units from India. Alarm was expressed in England over this policy because of the growing unrest in India.

CHURCHILL TAKES NEW BRITISH POST. Winston Churchill, the British Minister of War, has accepted the post of Colonial Secretary. No explanation of the transfer was made, but it was attributed in semi-official quarters to his lack of accord with Premier Lloyd George regarding German disarmament and reparations.

FIFTY-SEVEN LOST WITH SUBMARINE. Six officers and fifty-one men were lost when the British submarine K-5 disappeared off Land's End. The cause of the disaster was unknown.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT is hereby made of the receipt for the Bowery Mission B. C. fund of $50, from a friend somewhere in Nebraska.

twist her arms from the slim, brutal hands that held them; but the hands did not loosen their hold. She told herself, as she struggled, that Jim had spoken the truth—that a scream, more or less, was an everyday occurrence in the tenement.

ALL at once she realized, with a dazed, sinking feeling, that the Young Doctor had had some foundation of truth in certain of his statements. Some of the slum people were like animals—very like animals! Jim, apparently, was all animal as he bent above her, easily holding her with his hands. Nothing that she said could reach him—nothing. She realized why the Young Doctor had wanted her to leave the Settlement House—before any of her dreams had been shattered, before her faith in mankind had been abused! She realized why, at times, he had hurt her and with the realization came the knowledge that she wanted him, desperately, at that minute—that he, out of all the people in the world, was the one that her heart was calling to in her time of need. She wanted the strength of him, the protection.

Once before, earlier in the afternoon, she had realized that there was much of the cat in Jim. Now she realized it again, with a new sense of fear and dislike. For Jim was not claiming the kiss that he wanted; in a straightforward way—he was holding her gloatingly, as a cat tortures a mouse. He was letting her know, without words, that she was utterly helpless—that he could kiss her when he wanted to, and not until he wanted to. There was something horribly playful in his attitude. She struggled again—but more weakly; her strength was going. If there were only somebody to help—somebody!

And then, all at once, she remembered—with a blinding sense of relief—what she had been forgetting. She remembered that there was Somebody—a Somebody Who is always ready to help—a Somebody who watches over the fate of every little sparrow. . . .

"If you hurt me," she said desperately, to Jim, "God will know! Let go of me—or I'll—"

Jim interrupted.

"Yer'll scream!" he chuckled, and there was cruel mirth in the chuckle. "Yer'll scream, an' God will take care o' yer! Well—scream! I don't believe as God can help yer. God ain't never been in this tenement—as far as I know!"

DESPITE her weight of fear and loathing, Rose-Marie was suddenly sorry for Jim. There was something pitiful—something that he did not realize the pathos of—in his speech. God had never been in the tenement—God had never been in the tenement! All at once she realized that Jim's wickedness, that Jim's point of view, was not wholly his fault. Jim had not been brought up, as she had, in the clean out-of-doors; he, like many another slum child had grown to manhood without his proper heritage of fresh air and sunshine. One could not entirely blame him for thinking of his home, the only home that he had ever known, as a Godless place. She stopped struggling and her voice was suddenly calm and sweet as she answered Jim's statement.

"God," she said slowly, "is in this tenement. God is everywhere, Jim—everywhere! If I call on Him, He will help me!"

All at once Jim had swung her away from him, until he was holding her at arm's length. He looked at her from between narrowed lids, and there was bitter sarcasm in his eyes.

"Call on Him, then," he taunted, "call on Him! Lotta good it'll do yer!"

Rose-Marie's eyes were blurred with tears, her voice trembled, as she spoke. "Help me, God!" she said softly, "Help me, God!"

The Volky flat was still, for a moment. And then, with a surprising quickness, the door to the inner room swung open. Jim, who was standing with his back to the door, did not see the tiny, golden-haired figure that stood in the opening, but Rose-Marie caught her breath in a kind of a sob.

"I had forgotten Lily—" she murmured, almost to herself.

Jim, hearing her words, glanced quickly back over his shoulder. And then he laughed, and there was an added brutality in the tone of his laughter.

"Oh—Lily!" he laughed. "Lily! She won't help yer—not much! I was sort of expectin' this God that yer talk about—" The laughter died out of his face and he jerked her suddenly close—so close that she lay trembling in his arms. "Lily can't hear," he exulted, "'r see, 'r speak. I'll take my kiss—now!"

IT WAS then that Rose-Marie, forgetting herself in the panic of the moment, screamed. She screamed lustily, twisting her face away from his lips. And as she screamed Lily, as silently as a little wraith, started across the room. She might almost have heard, so straight she came. She might almost have known what was happening, so directly she ran to the spot where Rose-Marie was struggling in the arms of Jim. All at once her thin little hands had fastened themselves upon the man's trouser leg, all at once she was pulling at him, with all of her feeble strength.

Rose-Marie, still struggling, felt an added weight of apprehension. Not only her own safety was at stake—Lily, who was so weak, was in danger of being hurt. She jerked back, with another cry.

"Oh, God help me!" she cried, "God help us!"

Silently, but with a curious persistence, the child clung to the man's trouser leg. With an oath he looked back, again, over his shoulder.

"Leave go of me," he mouthed, "Leave go o' me—y' little brat! 'r I'll—"

And, "Let go of him, Lily," sobbed Rose-Marie, forgetting that the child could not hear, "Let go of him, or he'll hurt you!"

The child lifted her sightless blue eyes wistfully, to the faces above her—the faces that she could not see. And she clung the closer.

Jim was swearing, steadily—swearing with a dogged, horrible regularity. Of a sudden he raised his heavy foot and kicked viciously at the child who clung so tenaciously to his other leg. Rose-Marie, powerless to help, closed her eyes—opened them again almost spasmodically.

"You brute," she screamed, "you utter brute!"

Lily, who had never, in all of her broken little life, felt an unkind touch, wavered, as the man's boot touched her slight body. Her sightless eyes clouded, all at once, with tears. And then, with a sudden piercing shriek, she crumpled up—in a white little heap—upon the floor.

A Christian Civic Center

RICHLAND CENTER, Wisconsin, is trying a practical experiment in denominational co-operation. The town had six churches, five Protestant and one Catholic; it also had an unused auditorium, and it had three thousand people with no recreational center. Obviously the ingredients for a community center were all there and all that was needed was a little mixing. So representatives of the six churches got together and decided to be the mixers.

After talking the matter over, they went to the City Council with the proposal that if the town would fit up the auditorium building with social rooms, gymnasium and baths, the churches would unite to employ a secretary to direct the social life of the whole community. The city council fell in with the plan, the churches canvassed the town for additional subscriptions, and now the "Christian Civic Center" is the most going affair in the entire town with an influence steadily increasing as its work progresses.

"Such a Simple Way to Rout a Cold"

So says Aunt Mary, and she knows whereof she speaks. At the first sign of a cold, she used to mix a mustard plaster. It was a harsh but effective remedy. Now, Aunt Mary uses Musterole.

Musterole has all the virtues of the old-fashioned plaster, but is without the blister. Just rub a little of the clean white ointment on your chest or throat. First there is a gentle tingle, then a soothing coolness. And way down deep underneath the skin, where the Musterole has penetrated, there is generated a peculiar heat which soon dissipates congestion and sends the cold away.

Musterole is safe and effective, too, for children. It relieves the inflamed or congested conditions that go with croupy colds and irritated throats. Keep Musterole always handy in the house. At all drug stores, jars at 35c and 65c. $3.00 hospital size.

Lessons on Citizenship

International Sunday School Lesson for February 13

Deut. 8:6-11; Matt. 22:15-22; 34-40

By LUTHER DENNY WHITTEMORE, Litt.D.

THE selections from Matthew on which this study is based can not be regarded primarily as lessons on citizenship, for they were written as successive chapters in the story of the conflict which was precipitated by the enemies of Jesus and which continued with increasing intensity until the end; but the principles involved may be applied in all the complex relations of people with each other, and particularly in the perplexing situations where there is apparent contradiction between duty to God and duty to the state, between obedience to the voice of conscience and compliance with the demands of government.

The Bible as a whole is a wonderfully comprehensive textbook on citizenship, containing the laws of Moses, the unrivaled lawgiver; the history of the Jews, the most enlightened nation of antiquity; and the teachings of Jesus concerning the Kingdom of Heaven, the highest social ideal which has ever been conceived.

The Conflict. It is a familiar experience that we remember best and longest the events which at the time of their occurrence make the most vivid impression, upon our minds—those which most powerfully affect the feelings, or those which are decisive factors in our own lives. This explains in part why the writers of the Gospel story described in such detail the scenes with which the last days of the Master's earthly life were crowded. At such a time events seem momentous which ordinarily would appear as trifling incidents. Thus, because vital issues were at stake, the questioning of Jesus by the Pharisees and His replies were far more serious than the casual discussion of mooted questions.

ARoused to desperation by the pointed parables by which Jesus had so clearly shown His condemnation of their attitude towards the Kingdom of Heaven, the Pharisees in a war of words had taken the offensive; and with the Herodians as allies, they had contrived a stratagem from which they thought that Jesus could not escape.

"Tell us," they said, "is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?" "Yes" or "No" was the expected answer. "Yes, it is lawful," would alienate the loyalty and quench the enthusiasm of the multitudes who had saluted Him as the Son of David, and would make His Messianic claims appear preposterous; while "No" would classify Him with the Zealots and reveal His purpose to defy the government of Rome. In either case His answer could be used as evidence against Him.

The reply of Jesus, "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's," has been called by some the greatest of all His sayings. Its immediate effect was to disconcert His adversaries and to force them to execute a new attack. The "saying" has become a proverb, the final word regarding the universal obligation of loyalty to the government of the state and to the government of God. Here, as elsewhere in His teaching, Jesus deals in principles rather than in rules, and leaves it to the individual's judgment to determine what specific things belong to Cæsar and what things belong to God.

The Citizenship of Jesus. Jesus did not discuss the theory of civil government, nor did He question the right of governments to exercise authority. He Himself performed the duties of a citizen. He took upon Himself the obligations of a patriotic Jew, observing the law, and honoring the heroes of the race and the nation to which He belonged. He quoted the great prophets and was familiar with the law, which He came to fulfil, not to destroy. No act or word of His could have created a suspicion of disloyalty. He loved His country, and wept over the city of Jerusalem. He sent His disciples first on a mission to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. He did not attempt to overthrow the authority of the rulers of the Jews, although he tried to convert them from the error of their ways.

On the other hand, Jesus did not oppose the supremacy of Rome. He mingled with Roman officials and healed the daughter of the Roman centurion. He paid the tax required by Roman law. He was a friend of publicans, and chose Matthew, a tax-collector, as one of His disciples. He was born in Bethlehem, whither His parents had gone in compliance with a requirement of the Roman emperor. Jesus saw no inconsistency between love of His own country and respect for all others. He was an internationalist in the finest sense. His Heavenly Father was not the deity of a single race, but the God and Father of all men everywhere. The Kingdom of Heaven was broad enough to embrace people of all nations, to whom the disciples were ultimately sent.

THE higher law. It must be acknowledged that the customs and laws of men are not always in harmony with the laws of God. What, then, is the Christian citizen's duty? Does conscientious objection always justify non-conformity? This is a question which each must answer to his own conscience and to his God. There are surely circumstances under which the judgment of an individual must be subjected to the judgment of an enlightened state. It may be presumption for one man to decide that he alone is right and all others wrong; and it may be better to submit than to rebel. On the other hand, the noble army of the martyrs have obeyed a higher law. Peter and John, when they were forbidden to preach in the name of Jesus, chose to obey God rather than men. The phrase, "My country, right or wrong," may be patriotic if it expresses a devotion like that of a father for a wayward son, and if it stimulates a high endeavor to make and keep the country right; but no one who lives in the present generation and who recognizes the supreme obligation of obedience to God, will grant the infallibility of states or will assert that under all circumstances whatsoever, a nation's program must be supported by its citizens.

The great commandment. Jesus' answer to the question, "Which is the great commandment?" was precisely that which the strictest of the Pharisees would have given; for Jesus quoted the words written on the phylactery worn by patriotic Jews, and possibly by his questioner. The words of the second commandment were familiar also; but Jesus was the first to teach that love to God is manifested best in service to one's fellow-man. "If ye love me," He said, to His disciples, "keep my commandments; and this is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you."

In this the Pharisees of Jesus' time were lacking. Acknowledging the obligation to obey the commandments and professing to obey, they lacked one thing—the spirit of neighborliness. The wounds of the world today will not be healed by hatred or antagonism, nor by the cold discussion of questions of theology; but they will respond, and are responding, to the treatment of practical religion.

As a summary of this lesson nothing could be more fitting than the thirteenth chapter of Romans, which reflects the spirit of Jesus and repeats His words: "Render, therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor. Owe no man anything, but to love one another; for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law."

He Muses Over Questions Provoked by Prices and Prices

By DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

Question 1. When a farmer brings a calf's hide to town and gets 98 cents for it at the tanner's or the packer's and then crosses the street and pays $15 for a pair of shoes for his wife, how much would the farmer have received for the hide if the shoes were marked down to $8.99?

Question 2. If eggs are quoted in the market at 73 cents a dozen and a New York hotel charges 50 cents for two boiled, how many people will pay the 50 cents rather than make a fuss?

Question 3. When corn drops from $1.86 a bushel to 30 cents, and hogs from $20 a hundred to $9, why are pork chops and bacon the same price as when corn was $1.86 and hogs $20 a hundred? (No answer expected.)

Question 4. How many profiteers have been sent to jail for profiteering?

Question 5. How much profit makes a person a profiteer?

Question 6. When sugar drops from 21 to 9 cents a pound, why does the price of candy go up?

Question 8. Semi-anthracite coal was $14.50 a ton last winter on account of less production. With more production this winter and more coal in sight the same coal is $18 a ton. How much coal will I have to burn to keep warm if I am a school teacher getting a salary of $76 a month?

Question 9. How long will the coal profiteer have to burn?

Question 10. If a table d'hôte dinner in an American city costs $6.50 and it takes $2 a week to keep a child from starving in China, how many table d'hôte dinners will a city man have to eat to save one child?

Question 11. If a necessity like chewing-gum is still five cents a package, why have daily papers gone up to ten cents for a Sunday edition?

Question 12. Railroad passenger engineers get $3,129 a year. Ministers average less than $1,000. Make your own question.

Question 13. The amount of money spent for tobacco in the United States is more than is spent for education and religion. What for?

Question 14. Do profiteers ever read editorials against them? Profiteers please answer.

Question 15. If a difference of $9 in a barrel of flour is a market fact, why do I still keep paying the same price for a loaf of bread the same size?

Question 16. If it costs me and my family $2,500 a year to live, what will it cost me to have a funeral if my salary is only $2,499?

Question 17. If it costs more to live in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Detroit and Chicago than it does in London, Quebec, Winnipeg, New Zealand, and Samoa—finish the sentence.

Question 18. If $1 is equal to 50 cents, why will not 50 cents buy one dollar's worth?

Question 19. If life is worth living, what is the living worth? Thank you.

IT IS one of the mysteries of the decline in the price of many articles of merchandise that those who have been selling at a top-notch figure are so frankly taking the buying public into their confidence, and many a customer who bought a suit of clothes or a pair of shoes or gloves, now walks pensively by the shop or store into which he paid easy money, and as he gazes sadly at the same goods marked, "At Cost," he does some rapid-fire mathematics and wonders why he didn't have sense enough to wait and do his shopping after the holidays instead of before. For he sees identically the same overcoat he paid $87 for marked down to $43.89. And he gazes long at a suit of clothes once $76.50 now going for $39.25. And as his eyes roam over the display of "gents' furnishings, and note the same make and weave of ties, formerly $6.91 now $3.64, he heaves a sigh of useless regret that he did not let the old ties do the business a little longer.

But the thing that the shopper begins to ask is a question that revolves like an old-fashioned pinwheel in his brain as he dwells on the words, "At Cost," attached to the garments in the "gents' furnishing or the "ladies' cloak emporium.

"If," his mind begins to revolve, "that overcoat cost me $87 and it is now being sold 'at cost' for $43.89, how much did the furnishing man make on the coat? And if the suit that formerly cost me $76.50 is now going 'at cost' for $39.25, why would it not be a good plan for me to sell out the business I am now in or quit teaching school, and go to selling 'gents' furnishings before the holidays? Yes, why not?"

And the man—who, by the way is our old friend, Ultimate Consumer—passes on a little farther, and stops meditatively in front of a "ladies' cloak emporium. He stops because he sees those magic words again, just as he saw them in front of the "gents' furnishing place. He is now regarding, with serious interest the figures on a fur-caped cloak, a twin to the one he bought for his wife before the holidays. On this garment, which gracefully adorns the smiling figure of a red-cheeked "lady" in the window, the man reads, "At cost! Formerly $159. Now $68.72."

Old Man Ultimate Consumer is pained and surprised by this announcement. He paid $159 for the cloak, that is, for one just like this one. And it is now draped gracefully about a handsomer person, he says to himself, than the "lady" in the window. He does not begrudge giving her the cloak. It is not hat. But he cannot help wondering why, if the real "cost" of the garment was $68.72, the cloak man did not charge a fair profit to the buyer and ask more than the paltry sum of $159?

This question is so hard to answer that he gives it up and walks down past the shoe store where he paid $14 for a pair of shoes before the holidays and they are marked "at cost, only $6.97 now," but the man does not stop. He is on his way home to tell his wife how fine she looks in the $159 cloak. But in his dreams Old Man Ultimate Consumer sees himself gazing with awe and admiration at the magic letters in the shop windows of the world "FORMERLY $8888888. NOW $8."

A Community Wedding Day

SOME castes in India observe a community wedding day once a year, and whether you are an ardent lover or a coy maiden you cannot get your nuptials celebrated until that date. But fancy the ease of the shepherd caste. They celebrate their weddings only once in twelve, fifteen or twenty-five years on one day in a prescribed month throughout the entire state. What if you became engaged just after such a date and had to wait for twenty-four years? And think of how little importance the bride would be when all the other marriages of a quarter century were celebrated on her wedding-day.

A WEDDING ceremony with a vivid touch is that of the Brahma caste in India. The bride dressed in engaging trousers is seated in a closed palanquin, while the unfortunate bridegroom has a foretaste of future conjugal bliss by having to walk around the palanquin seven times, being switched at each turn by an oleander branch in the hands of his new mother-in-law!

A Surprise

Awaits you in this ten-day test

This is to urge that you brush teeth for ten days in a new way. Combat the film. Bring other good effects. The whiter, cleaner, safer teeth will be a delightful surprise.

To millions of people this method is bringing a new era in teeth cleaning.

It combats film

One object is to fight the film—that viscous film you feel. This is the teeth's great enemy. It dims the teeth and causes most tooth troubles.

Film clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. The ordinary tooth paste does not effectively combat it. So night and day it may do a damage which few people have escaped.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Despite the tooth brush, all these troubles have been constantly increasing.

New methods now

Dental science, after diligent research, has found effective film combatants. Able authorities have amply proved them. Now leading dentists, in Europe and America, advise their daily use.

The methods are embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And millions of people have already adopted it.

Watch these desired effects

Pepsodent combats the film in two effective ways. Then it leaves the teeth so highly polished that film-coats cannot easily adhere.

It also brings other effects which modern authorities desire. It multiplies the salivary flow, as certain foods would do. That is Nature's great tooth-protecting agent.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits which otherwise cling and may form acid. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

Thus twice a day it brings to users unique tooth protection.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears. Read in our book the scientific reason for each new effect.

Do this now. It is most important, both to you and yours. It may lead to life-long benefits which you cannot afford to miss.

After the Storm

YESTERDAY it stormed. It stormed very hard, indeed—so hard that the gutters were a torrent of muddy water and the streets were rendered well-nigh impassable because of the slush and icy particles that crowded them. It stormed so hard that the gray clouds in the sky seemed almost touching the earth; so hard that the rain fell like hostile arrows upon the hurrying and uncomfortable population of our city.

Yesterday it stormed. But today the whole world seemed in a joyous frame of mind—in a party mood, almost. It might have been spring again, so warm it was—the bare trees might almost have been tricked into showing fresh young leaves. And the sky was as smiling as a pretty girl and as blue as the flowers that grow in the promised land. And the population of our city forgot to hurry, forgot that they had ever been in the least uncomfortable. With the sidewalks dry again and the gutters in a normal condition it was hard to believe that the world had ever known the unpleasantness of a rain storm.

I came to the office in an exceedingly cheerful frame of mind. I was glad of the beautiful day; I was warm and dry and happy. I wanted to raise my face to the sky and laugh into its blue beauty; I wanted to skip along the dry pavements and to sing. Life stretched warm friendly hands to me; Life smiled into my eyes. And I, meeting Life's eyes, smiled back!

Our editor looked up as I came into the room. He seemed happy, too. The glory of the sun-lit day had touched his heart, had brought gladness to his soul.

"Isn't it wonderful," he said to me, as I seated myself at my desk, "isn't it wonderful to have a day like this happen after the storm?"

Almost without meaning to, I asked a question. Almost against my own volition, I spoke.

"What storm?" I questioned. "What storm?"

For the sunshine and blue sky of one pleasant day had enabled me to forget the unpleasantness of the day that lay in the background.

SOME historian—or perhaps it was some novelist or essay writer—once said that God's greatest gift to the human race was the gift of forgetfulness. "We can feel bitterness and woe," he said, "and we can suffer untold pain—during the blackness of the night. But when the morning comes we can put the night behind us; we can forget the fear and the pain and the woe. For the sunlight has a healing power—a power too potent for mere words to describe!"

I know a girl—now a nearly famous and rather well-paid artist—who had a very bitter childhood. Life held little of joy for her, little of the pleasurable excitement that childhood craves. Poverty was the bleak guest who sat always at the family table; want was the gaunt visitor who sat wolf-like on the doorstep of her home! Luxury was an unknown word to her.

"All of my life, until I was sixteen," she told me once, "I never had a new dress. I never owned a fresh, uncreased hair-ribbon. I used to see doll babies in shop windows when I went downtown on infrequent errands. But I never owned any except one that I constructed for myself. The very paper that I made drawings on—even as a small child I loved to draw—was cheap wrapping-paper!"

Sunshine and Blue Sky Soon Bring Forgetfulness of Trouble

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I WISH the rain would go away,"
Said little Johnny Jones;
"The world is gloomy as a grave,
"The dampness hurts my bones!
"I wish, deep in my heart of hearts,
"That rain would never be—
"Why can't all days be sunny ones?"
Said Johnny Jones to me.

Before I had a chance to speak,
Small Johnny's sister Jane
Said kindly to the little lad—
"The Lord sends storms and rain,
"To make the sunny days that come,
"More beautiful and bright!
"It is His way," said sister Jane,
"His way is always right!"

dolls that I didn't have, the dresses that I never owned, are only vague spots in an otherwise vivid picture. The things that I remember are the bright days—the days when we had unexpected cream puffs for dinner, the day when I made a beautiful color by mixing two drab shades of house-paint together, the day when my mother laid aside the monotonous work that she seemed always to be doing and took me to the zoo. I find myself remembering the time, at school, when I won a prize for drawing—rather than the time when I heard a little girl say that I was the shabbiest one in the class! Mercifully the unhappiness and the resentment that I used to feel have become background. And the happiness has come radiantly to the fore."

MY friend, who is no longer a poverty-stricken child, can look back upon her cheerless past with a light word and laughter. And I have known others who could look back with the same bland forgetfulness upon equally drab days. Some of the great people of the world have come to the front from—and perhaps because of—unauspicious circumstances. And, arriving at the top of the ladder, those unauspicious circumstances have not made them the less sympathetic, or the more bitter. For God's gift of forgetfulness has aided them in remembering only the brightest side of the things that they have gone through.

I fancy that Lincoln, as President of the United States, did not dwell upon the hardships of his childhood. I think, rather, that he often looked back with a sort of quiet joy upon the books that he borrowed, and the love of his wonderful mother, and the education that he snatched where he could. The miles that he had to tramp in quest of the books, the fineness of manner that his mother could not give to him, the necessary schooling that he had to miss, meant nothing—when he was the man of the hour. He had forgotten, long before his death, the storm that had been his early life. For the sunshine had followed the storm—as it always does—bringing forgetfulness.

That is the secret of it all. The sunshine always follows the storm! After a day—or a week or a month or years—of unpleasantness joy will come again. And the joy will, like the sunshine, make the unhappiness fade into the background.

Of course this does not apply to every life. Of course some people will allow early disappointments to blight future happiness and to banish joy. But people like this are in the minority. They are the ones who, on a sunshiny morning, remember the rain storm of yesterday and look less kindly at the blue sky. They are the ones who would rather live in the dark background of the masterpiece of life, than be one of the leading figures in it. They are the ones who will never go far because they cannot—because they are not big enough enough to go far! They are the ones who look back, always, into the shadows, instead of looking forward into the light. They are the real failures.

Sorrows and disappointments and fears are God's storms. The comforts and new chances of life are His sunshiny days. He has given them to us as a part of His greatest gift—the gift of forgetfulness.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

LETTERS from many states, received this week, show that prayers for nation-wide revival are being continuously offered. There are also prayers for quickening of local churches, for community awakening, and for the conversion of friends and relatives.

Mrs. M. L. H. asks prayers for a wonderful awakening and the salvation of many souls during the revival at Emden, Ill., and that the Lord may direct them in all things.

"Please pray that we may have a Holy Ghost revival in the Cora Church," writes M. M., Lebanon, Kans., "and that we may have a minister who is filled with the Holy Ghost."

"Evangelistic meetings are being held at Oxford, N. Y.," writes a friend. "Pray that God may pour out the Holy Spirit and great good be accomplished."

"I ask prayers for the churches in Wahoo," writes L. A. M., Wahoo, Neb., "that they may be brought nearer to the Father."

A. E. J., Danville, Ia., asks prayers for a revival; and that ten men who have lived long lives in sin may be converted; that a friend who is nearly blind may have his eyesight restored; that an orphan boy may have the way opened for him to secure an education; and for financial help.

Mrs. S. K. S., writes: "I am a reader of the Christian Herald and I am writing now to ask for intercession and prayers for Mrs. H. Y., for recovery of her vision. She is a devoted Christian and firm believer in the power of the Living Presence of Christ and in answer to prayer. I also ask for intercession and prayer for my recovery of physical vigor and renewal of the sense of hearing."

Reader, Mt. Olive, N. C., asks prayers for the "conviction and reformation of the intemperate in our community, and also for a general spiritual awakening and growth in grace in the entire community."

"Friend in Need" asks prayers for deliverance from Satanic influence and acknowledges answered prayer in the past.

"Sinful" writes: "Will you please pray that in this New Year I shall not be overcome with evil, either from within or without, but that instead, the Christ will be formed in me, and, abiding in Him, the evil be overcome."

V. H., Oberlin, Kansas, asks that we "Pray that God's will may be done in our church building campaign, and His name glorified. Also, that we may have an outpouring of God's spirit and the pastor may be filled with the Holy Spirit."

Among the individual requests are the following: for healing, 150; spiritual advancement, 22; conversion of relatives and friends, 100; peace, 20; faith, 13; success, 22; forgiveness, 26; blessing, 6; wisdom, 37; heart's desire, 42; reunion, 11; and for patience, 3.

We have received grateful acknowledgments of answered prayer from the following: Mrs. W. A. M., Mrs. P. H. T., I. B. S., Friend, M. L., Reader in China, E. E. M., A. H., Mrs. E. C. M., H. M. M., Mrs. F. W., Mrs. F. R., and Mrs. S. J. S.

Young People's Topics for February 13

Thy Kingdom Come—In My Home

C. E., and B. Y. P. U. Matt. 6:7-15

THE beginnings of life are in the loving circles of the home, where also are the beginnings of love's sweet lessons and love's best service. "That is best which lies nearest," Dickens, in "Bleak House," describes a character with handsome eyes, who had a curious trick of seeing afar off. She could see Africa, but had no time to see her own family. She had large schemes for the colonization of the surplus populations on the Niger, but her own children grew up uncared for, dirty and ignorant. It was not at all strange that we learn of the wreck of that home and the bankruptcy of her husband. Given the kingdom of heaven values at the fireside and those who sit by that fireside will take the kingdom of heaven to all sides of the world.

How do persons succeed in great things? By fidelity to the small tasks. How are great demands met? By meeting the demands near at hand. We act in great wide movements as we act in more restricted environments. Back of every Christian, is the Christian home. Back of every Christian man and woman, times without number, is a Christian mother and father. God at the fireside, God in the nursery, God in the drawing-room, and God in the kitchen, and in the attic and in the cellar, God in the home by the family altar and in the conversation and the daily contact of intercourse and fellowship is what will bring in the Kingdom of God in the community and the state and the nation and the world. There is no institution so potent as the Christian home.

Restoring a Country

E. L., Neh. 2:11-18

NEHEMIAH went to Jerusalem. His mission and message was restoration. See the Scripture reference. The story of the restoration by Nehemiah we know. The story of the restoration of present lands is in the making. We, too, have a part in this program of reconstruction. Reconstruction is a word that has been given fresh interpretation and new emphasis these last few years. But words are only symbols for ideas and ideals. Reconstruction began twenty centuries ago on a hill-top called Calvary. The hope for the rebuilding of the world, for the fusion of the nations into righteousness, for the restoration of humanity everywhere is Jesus Christ.

A writer in Leslie's Weekly discussing the various plans and programs, the divers schemes and variegated themes offered as the remedy says: "Why not try religion?" Indeed, why not? Christianity is the solution for the unrest and unreason and the fret and fever in this land and lands across the sea. There is only one reason we can offer for this contention. It is because wherever and whenever Christianity has been honestly, consistently, sincerely and passionately tried it has always met the situation. Christianity is not an experiment but an experience. The Gospel is not an intellectual abstraction but a life-giving attraction.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by the Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Officers are: Graham C. Patterson, President; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice-President; Luther D. Fernald, Treasurer and Business Manager.

Questions and Answers

MR. G., Leedey, Okla., sends this letter, which may give an idea to other readers: "I have had an inspiration and I can not get rid of the thought until I tell it to some one, and why not the Christian Herald Family? Many little towns in country districts lack libraries. The thought came to me the other day: why not give your library to start one for your town? But I demurred, 'Why, they are mine.' I said, 'They are like friends. I could not give them up.' Then very suddenly, something within me said 'Selfish, selfish!' I began to see the point. We accumulate books and I daresay we finally grow selfish with them. Of course, we will loan them to a friend, who may be able to buy; but how about the poor and those in the country who are not on our list of friends? Must they go without? Our little town needs a library so much, and a place where the young people might go evenings and read, instead of wandering off to questionable places. These are new times, and it is a good way to convince ourselves by looking over our books and saying, 'What Would Jesus Do?' We all know His answer."

In a majority of American homes there are books that could well be spared for such a good purpose as our reader suggests. The Christian Herald knows from experience how such gifts would be valued. A few good-hearted families setting an example such as our correspondent indicates, would soon inspire many others to help by gifts of books to assemble the nucleus of a little public library in some rural section where it would be greatly appreciated.

Mrs. A. M. P., Iuka, Ill. A polyglot Bible is one which gives the Hebrew, Greek and Latin texts side by side, for convenience of comparison in questions affecting translation, etc. Some of the early polyglots gave Chaldean, Syriac and Latin. The London Polyglot, published in 1657, was still more comprehensive, giving Latin, Syriac, Samaritan, and Arabic in one volume, and Ethiopic, Persian and Chaldean as parts of another volume.

Mrs. G. H. W., Chester, Vt. makes a plea for professing Christians to stop doing unnecessary work on Sunday. She also pleads for Christian "movies," and for the suppression of those pictures that teach evil ways, especially to the young.

Reader, Calif. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League. The swearing habit is one that, once acquired, is hard to conquer. Take counsel with some godly woman of your acquaintance, and she may be able to suggest a way to make an impression where you have failed. Above all, don't lose faith. Pray that things may come right, that the outbreaks may be controlled, and that a deep sense of the sin of such a course may come to the heart and conscience of the offender.

M. B., Hartford, Conn. writes: "I thought you might like to know where my Christian Herald goes. First, I read it; then I let a sister have it to read. Next, I send it to an aunt in England who lets her neighbors have it, and then it is sent to a fever hospital. So you see it makes quite a number of people happy. I have taken the Christian Herald for years. My mother took it long before I did. We look forward with pleasure every week for its visits."

P. M., Indiana County, Pa. According to the New York World Almanac for 1921, marriages between first or "full" cousins is forbidden in all of the States except Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Georgia, Idaho, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia [and Washington.

J. T. S., Norfolk, Va. asks: "Will you kindly explain the meaning of John 21: 25, which says the world could not contain the books that could be written of what Jesus did?"

The previous verse is John's personal attestation of the truth of what he has written concerning Jesus, and verse 25 is intended to let all men know that he might have written much more—enough to fill many books—concerning the teachings and doings of the Saviour, had it been necessary, for the material at hand was almost inexhaustible. We can readily understand that the "beloved disciple," who was probably closer to the heart of Christ than the others, had treasured many remembrances of those wonderful days of the ministry in Galilee. Whether he wrote his Gospel in Ephesus or Patmos, the events of the past, including every act and expression of the Master, crowded John's memory, and the impulse to record them must have been hard to resist.

Pick Delicious Strawberries This Summer and Fall

EVERBEARING strawberry plants set out this spring will bear high quality berries this season until severe frost. Farmer's Bulletin 1043, U. S. Department of Agriculture, says:

"The Progressive is the most widely grown of the everbearing strawberries. It is liked because of its hardiness, its resistance to leaf-spot diseases, its excellent dark-red fruit; also because if planted in early spring it yields a considerable quantity of fruit the same year. It is especially adapted to home gardens and intensive culture on rich soil, amply supplied with moisture. It is adapted to regions north of those in which the Klondike succeeds, but has not been found adapted to the south."

100 plants are enough for the average family; price $2.10 f. o. b. Neosho. Order now for early spring shipment. We will mail you immediately our 80 page booklet "Inside Facts of Profitable Fruit Growing." It will tell you how to plant and care for your strawberry bed and is full of practical Fruit Growing Advice. Free to customers; to others 10c.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BOOK DEPT., BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

Aladdin

Building Cost Cut $1000

MY NEW home cost $1,000 less than local builders' figures. Everyone who saw the house being built knows that it contains the best grade of material. It is as well built as any substantial, durable and handsome house in town. It is double floored in both stories and the floor and walls are lined to keep out the cold. I frankly do not believe that even for the additional $1,000 that figured in the next lowest bid, it would have been possible to erect by any other method as fine a home as mine.

All Material Shipped Complete

When the material for my home was delivered by freight it came in one complete shipment. Not only the lumber, but the nails, locks, hinges, lath, plaster, window frames, doors, paint—everything in fact, came in one sealed box car. I have heard enough of the difficulties people encounter in getting delivery of this or that necessary item when they buy material from various sources. I bought all my material complete from one source and never had a single worry or a moment's delay on account of needing some missing article.

House Quickly Erected

In twenty-one working days after unloading the material the house was finished and

Because he built an Aladdin Home this man undercut prices by one-third ready for occupancy. During those twenty-one days I kept accurate record of every dollar expended. As the days went by I saw clearly I was going to undercut the lowest bid that had been offered me before I discovered the Aladdin System of homebuilding. My complete saving amounts to at least $1,000, about one-third of the bill of material.

Send for Book of Homes

Originally I had intended to employ an architect, but a friend loaned me a book of plans from which I selected a very suitable design. Local builders gave me estimates of the cost to build a house of the design I had selected. Just before closing a deal an advertisement I saw caused me to send for a catalog of Read-cut houses. The catalog came in prompt response to my request. I found in it a design a trifle larger but substantially the same as the one on which I had received estimates. The catalog price caused me to write at once to the manufacturers for full particulars.

All Material Cut-to-Fit

I learned that the lumber for Read-cut houses is all cut-to-fit according to standardized methods. This system eliminates the wastage of odd pieces that ordinarily would occur where the sawing is done on the site of the building. The saving amounts to 18 per cent. of the lumber costs. The factory method of cutting the lumber by gang-saws, mitre-machines and other labor-saving devices reduces carpenter costs on the job by at least 30 per cent.

Practically Wholesale Price

The Aladdin Company manufactures houses in enormous quantities, thus selling the houses direct to the homebuilder at an immense saving, under local retail prices in which so many middleman profits have been included. I was convinced that it was safe, sure and economical to buy an Aladdin Read-cut Home and the results have more than justified my faith.

Is a Satisfied Customer

"I am satisfied with my dealings with The Aladdin Company. My home has attracted favorable comment here and it meets all my expectations. If I ever build again I will build another Aladdin Home because I know in advance I shall get more for my money than I could otherwise."

Homebuilders to the Nation

This is the story of hundreds, yes, even thousands of other homebuilders. Aladdin Homes are known from Maine to California, from Puget Sound to the Gulf, and wherever they have been built they have brought satisfaction. No matter where you live there is an Aladdin Home near you.

Quick Service from Mills

Aladdin Mills and distributing offices are located in the four greatest timber-producing areas of this country, so that house material is shipped direct from the forest by the shortest possible haul, making quick service. Short hauls mean low costs.

Aladdin designs include arrangements and architecture to suit everyone. The plans are the result of highest talent and long experience, and there is a large variety to choose from.

Aladdin is referred to as the National Homebuilding Service. It is the American way of saving dollars for fellow Americans, modern production (by original method) of a better product for less cost than has ever been accomplished before.

Bunyan's Holy War

is every-bit as entrancing as "Pilgrim's Progress" and which now, in view of the remarkable parallel it furnishes to the great world war just closed, should be read everywhere.

He shows how the forces of evil surrounded Man's soul on every side, undermining its morals, subjecting it to irresistible temptations and bringing its people, good and bad, into the toils of sin ere they were aware of it. It is a story which describes the experiences of mankind as a whole in resisting evil, and every incident is related with such a semblance of reality that each reader can find for himself or herself in the story, many points of personal spiritual experience.

This standard work is fully illustrated and bound in cloth, and sells separately for $1.00

Farm Problems and an Answer

Co-operative Corporations Would Put Agriculture on a Big Business Basis

By T. A. McNEAL

Editor of the Kansas Farmer and Mail and Breeze

FOR several decades there has been a steadily increasing trend of population away from the country toward the cities and towns. One does not need to be an old man to be able to remember when the urban population of the United States was not more than half as great as the rural, while at the present time the proportion is nearly the reverse. That this is not a healthy condition is generally conceded; but while it is to be deplored, no plan has as yet been put into operation to check the evil.

There are a number of contributing causes for this shifting of population, but they can all be summed up generally in the statement that people leave the farms and go to the cities because they believe they can have better opportunities and more enjoyment there. Experience may possibly disillusion them; but the lure of the cities continues to attract the rural population.

The writer was born and reared on a farm and thinks he understands fairly well the reasons for this increasing exodus, and will name some of them, not necessarily in the order of their importance, but as they occur to his mind:

1. Long hours of labor.
2. Uncertainty as to financial reward.
3. Lack of educational advantages.
4. Lack of social life and monotony of existence.
5. High price of farm lands and diminishing fertility.
6. Increasing difficulty in procuring farm labor, either outdoors or in.

It is true that the invention of improved farm machinery has lightened the toil of the farm to a considerable extent, and has enabled farmers to cultivate a great deal more ground; but the increasing difficulty of getting farm labor has made it necessary for the farmers to work longer hours themselves, so that life on the farm is still largely drudgery. If the farmer himself has reason to complain of the amount of work he is compelled to perform, his wife has more reason to complain, for it is even more difficult for her to obtain help in the house than for her husband to obtain help in the field.

AN EVEN greater drawback to farm life than the amount of toil involved is the uncertainty of the financial rewards. Contrary to what is perhaps a general impression among those who have had no experience in actual farm life, there is no business which is so constant and so uncertain a gamble as that of farming.

No farmer, when he plants a crop, knows that he will reap a harvest. He must take chances on too much rain or too much dry weather; on untimely frosts, on sudden and destructive storms; on blights which he can not anticipate or foresee; on devouring insects which may destroy his crop just when it is ready to ripen, or may attack the plants as soon as they appear above the surface. If he is fortunate enough to escape all these enemies to his prosperity, he is still not safe. At the time of planting the market may have seemed to justify his going into a certain crop extensively, but by harvest time the price may have fallen to a point where his crop will not pay the cost of cultivating and harvesting.

If the farmer decides to engage in stock-raising instead of depending on selling his crops, he still encounters uncertainties. Diseases, always dreaded, but often unpreventable—at least so far as his knowledge goes—break out among his flocks and herds and, often within a few days, all the fruit of his toil and saving, for an entire year, or more, is swept away. It is not uncommon for a farmer to lose anywhere from fifty to one hundred hogs from cholera in twenty-four hours, and this has occurred when each of the hogs represented a value of from $30 to $50.

I HAVE placed third among the causes which are steadily depleting the rural population, lack of educational advantages. In recent years there has been a good deal of agitation for better rural schools, and without doubt there has been great improvement in certain localities; but in many rural districts the educational facilities are little if any better than they were forty years ago, while in some the schools have even deteriorated.

The lack of social life and opportunities for enjoyment are closely associated with the lack of educational advantages, and while it may be said that many young men and young women leave the farms on account of lack of educational opportunities, it may also be said that higher education tends to wean these same boys and girls away from the farm. It has often been said that comparatively few of the college educated young men go back to the farm. The reason for it is easily understood. At the college or university, the boy finds congenial companions and gets a wider vision. When he goes home, the monotony of the farm life irks him. He is dissatisfied and feels that he is out of the current of affairs.

The same unwillingness to settle down again to farm life has been found among the young men who went to France. While they were enduring the hardships and dangers of the battlefields, most of them were homesick. They thought if they could only get back to the old homestead they would be entirely contented; but when they did get back, they found that there was something lacking which they craved. As a matter of fact, they had seen the world to a larger degree than most men ever see it in times of peace. Their horizons were widened and they craved the association of their fellow-men and the intellectual stimulus of association.

The rapid rise in the price of farm lands within the past few years, while it has encouraged speculation, has discouraged young men who were inclined to engage in the business of farming. Even if it was possible for the young men to raise the money necessary to make the initial payment on the land, and buy the necessary farm implements and live stock, he found it nearly impossible to produce enough from the land to pay the interest on his indebtedness, to say nothing of reducing the principal. On no basis of careful calculation was it possible to show a fair profit on the investment in farm land, in even the best farming districts, raising the ordinary farm crops and ordinary live stock. Speculators bought and sold farms in the same way they buy and sell outlying lots in a boom town, the prices asked and received having no relation to the actual worth of the property purchased.

I have given as last among the causes for the movement away from the farms to the cities and towns, the difficulty in procuring farm labor either in the field or in the house. This affects some of the most prosperous and intelligent farmers. They educate their children; the boys and girls see, or at least think they see, better opportunities, financially and socially, in the cities and towns than on the farm. That leaves the parents alone. They decide to move to town themselves, where they can have more leisure and more enjoyment. Another farm goes into the hands of a renter and the process of deterioration, both in the improvements and in the soil of that farm, commences and goes on at an increasing rate from year to year, until finally the farm becomes so impoverished that it will not yield a decent living either to the landowner or the renter.

The most alarming feature of the present rural situation is the rapid increase of renters as compared with farm-owners who till the lands they own. A few renters accumulate money or other property, but they are the exception. The rule is that the latter at the end of the year is little if any better off than at the beginning, while in a multitude of cases he loses instead of gains, until the foreclosure of the chattel mortgages on such personal property as he may have leaves him stranded and often embittered toward society. These are some of the problems which the farmer faces and which threaten the nation's agricultural interests, on which all the others are so largely dependent.

What is the remedy? Evidently, the only permanent cure for the acknowledged evil is a plan by which the business of farming not only will become as attractive, from a social and educational standpoint, as any other line of endeavor, but will offer as great financial rewards.

Any scheme to merely lend the farmer more money at a slightly better rate of interest, or to provide even better educational opportunities for his children, will not solve the problem. To lend him more money will only mean getting him deeper in debt, and to offer better educational facilities for his children, unless the social environment can be made more attractive, will result in more and more of the bright and ambitious young men and young women leaving the farms. Besides, loaning money to the farmers on their lands at better rates does not solve the most serious problem, that of the renter, at all. It only tends to raise the selling price of farm lands and make it that much more difficult for the poor man to obtain a farm.

I believe that it is quite possible to put into operation a plan which will not only make the business of agriculture the most profitable and most attractive in the world, but which will solve our most vexing economic problems.

It has been repeatedly demonstrated that our agricultural lands have nowhere near reached the limit of their possible productivity. A fifteen-year-old farmer boy in the State of South Carolina managed to raise considerably more than two hundred bushels of corn on a single acre, although the general average production of corn in the United States the same year was less than twenty-five bushels per acre. The boy used the best seed obtainable and gave his acre of ground the most careful cultivation and fertilization; but all that simply proves that it would be possible to increase the average everywhere several hundred per cent. above the present yield.

But if you mention the possibility of increased production to the farmer, he does not grow enthusiastic. He asks what it would avail him to increase his production, when the only probable effect, so far as he is concerned, would be to reduce the market price below the cost of production, so that his last state might even be worse than his first, in that he would have to work harder, hire more help—if he could get the help—use more machinery and increase his expenses generally without increasing his revenue. He calls attention to the fact that the price of his product is controlled by a few great buyers, and likewise the price of the finished product which he must buy is also controlled by a comparatively few great corporations.

GRANTING that this is true, the remedy must be in organizations of the farmers themselves which will put them in position to take over the control which at present is in the hands of others, so far as their products are concerned; combine production with the manufacture of the same into the finished product; close up the great gap between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays; apply the most scientific methods to the cultivation of land and the greatest efficiency possible to the management of their business; combine their credit so that they may pay to themselves the interest they now pay to the moneylenders; provide educational and social advantages better in every respect than are at present enjoyed by the dwellers in cities and towns; create a spirit of industry that will make work a pleasure instead of drudgery; create ideal living conditions; tremendously increase production and decrease the cost of distribution and bring about a better world condition.

The remedy will be found, as I believe, in the co-operative, corporation farm, which will be owned by the workers, and which will form a great productive and manufacturing unit. The amount of land embraced in each corporation farm would vary according to differing local climatic and soil conditions, but it will probably be found that an area of from ten to twenty miles square would be most convenient. While the square form would be most convenient, that in all probability would not always be possible, especially in a hilly or mountainous country; but for purposes of illustration, I will assume that a tract of reasonably level land, ten miles square, has been secured.

In the center of this tract would be located the homes, schools, mills and factories. If the land is reasonably fertile, it would be found that it would support in comfort and leave a margin of profit to an averaged-sized family for each eighty acres of land; a total of eight families to each section of land, or eight hundred families on the entire tract. Estimating an average of five to each family, this would mean a population of 4,000 persons. I think experience would demonstrate that the corporation farm would sustain and require a larger population than this, but for the purpose of this illustration, I will assume that as the figure.

The corporation would be capitalized for sufficient to represent the value of the land, the value of the homes of the inhabitants, the necessary buildings for schools, workshops, mills, factories, farm implements, live stock, necessary barns and outbuildings for the housing of the grain, the protection of the live stock, etc., the building of silos, the making of roads and other necessary improvements, and sufficient working capital to carry on the business of the corporation.

EACH worker would be required to be a stockholder, and each member of a family would also be a stockholder, in the case of minors the stock being held in trust until they attained their majority. The business of the corporation would be conducted under the general direction of a board of directors elected by the stockholders as directors of other corporations are elected, but with this difference: each stockholder would have one vote and no more in the election of directors, regardless of the amount of stock owned by the individual. This provision should be made to prevent the control of the corporation passing into the hands of a few persons.

The board of directors would select a general manager, with as many assistant managers as might be necessary, the general manager being given large discretionary powers in the matter of the selection of assistant managers.

Whatever mills and factories might be necessary to the conversion of the raw into the finished product would be built and owned by the corporation. These would presumably include a flouring mill, a cannery, a woollen mill, tannery, packing-house, and perhaps other factories, depending on the location of the corporation farm and the kind of products.

As one of the prime objects of such an enterprise would be to afford a complete and practical education to all of its stockholders and their children and also the fullest, healthiest and most delightful social life possible, the organization of the great central school would be a matter of the first and greatest consideration. This school would be closely correlated with the business of the corporation. Each child not only would be afforded the best sort of educational training, but in connection with it would be kept constantly in touch with industry, the study of the soil, the growing of crops, of fruits and flowers, the learning of every branch of industry connected with the great corporation farm and its allied industries.

Farming would be raised to the dignity of a learned profession, the greatest indeed of all the learned professions. Each corporation would establish its own bank and have authority to issue its own bonds as other corporations are authorized to do. This bank should be permitted to deposit its bonds in the United States Treasury and, with the authority of the Government, should be permitted to issue its notes based on its bonds. It should also be made a part of the Reserve Bank system and issue currency with the same facility as these banks are now permitted to issue currency. Instead of being at the mercy of outsiders, these farm corporations could easily control the distribution of their own finished products, and pay to their own stockholders the profits which now go to outsiders.

WOULD it pay? This is still such a materialistic and commercial age that when such a scheme as this is proposed, the first question asked is "Will it pay?" This does not mean will it pay in those things which are of so much greater consequence than mere wealth, but will it pay in dollars?

Of course, in the management of any corporation, efficiency and integrity of management are essential to success; but granting that these can and will be obtained, the success of such a venture is assured.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior shows that the average yield per acre on the government irrigated projects last year was $89. On the lands of such a corporation as I have suggested, where the raw is turned into the finished product, and the great expense saved of shipping the product hundreds or even thousands of miles to be manufactured, and then sent back to the original producers, loaded with not only the cost of freight both ways but also several wholesalers' and retailers' profits, the gross receipts per acre should be more than that desired from these irrigated lands; but assuming that it is less by fourteen dollars per acre, and assuming that 60,000 acres out of the total of 64,000 are utilized, the gross annual receipts would be $4,500,000 or $6,000 per family. It is safe to say that this is fully three times the gross receipts from the average eighty acres under our present system, even in the best agricultural districts of the country.

Under such a system, the poor man who is willing to work could very easily become a stockholder. The corporation could take his note secured by the stock itself, which would be held until paid for. His earnings on his stock, together with a certain percent of his wages, would be applied on payment for his stock, he being charged such rate of interest on his deferred payments as the corporation had to pay on its bonds, if bonds were issued.

The stock would be transferable, but only to resident stockholders, or to such persons as expected to become residents. If a stockholder should become dissatisfied or for any reason desire to move out of the corporation, he would have the privilege of selling his stock to the corporation at cost to him, plus the rate of interest paid by the corporation on its bonds, or the rate at which it could borrow money if desired.

The workers on the corporation farm would be carried to and from their work in comfortable motor-buses. Working co-operatively, agreeable division of labor would be possible so that the various groups of workers would be engaged in doing what they were best qualified to do, and which for that very reason would be most agreeable to them.

Fruit or nut bearing trees would line the paved highways leading out from the town to all parts of the great farm. Farmed scientifically, the land not only would be brought to its maximum production but its fertility would constantly increase, instead of decrease, as it does under our present unscientific and wasteful system. Agriculture and horticulture under such a system would become a pleasure instead of a drudgery, and these corporation farms would become the centers of culture, refinement and high ideals such as the world has never known heretofore.

THE United States Department of Agriculture is encouraging the development in Alaska of a considerable crop, grain and live-stock industry adapted to the comparatively short growing season of that Territory. It has five agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, one being located just under the Arctic Circle, where the temperatures range from plus eighty-eight degrees to minus sixty-three degrees. These agricultural stations have done considerable work in breeding and establishing new varieties of grains, berries, fruits, and economic plants suited to the short season, and the raising of domestic animals of all kinds, of which there is great need in Alaska because of its remoteness from the rest of the world.

A Jewish Christian on the Bowery

He's a Volunteer Worker, Who Has Led 11,000 to Christ

By WILLARD PRICE

COME on and serf God and den if He don't gif satisfaction go back and serf de devil again. You won't be noding out. You can't lose."

The speaker is a little Russian Jew with iron-gray mustache, gold teeth, sparse hair, concerned horizontal wrinkles across his forehead, steel-rimmed spectacles settled down over his nose and the most cheerful smile any face ever wore. He is known up and down the Bowery as "Joe the Jew."

"I've seen de time when I didn'd haf de money to buy de steam off a frankfurter," says Joe. Now, during the day time, he conducts a fine laundry business among Broadway clients. But at night he is to be found on the East Side, helping down-and-outs. "I make my money on Broadway and spend it on de Bowery," he explains.

During the twenty-seven years since he himself was converted, he has won over eleven thousand others. Surely a good return on the original investment!

WHEN Joe the Jew gets up on a mission platform and talks his cheerful philosophy, sings his home-made songs and smiles his God-made grin, there is no resisting him. He is far from beautiful, and his singing voice sounds like the delivery of a load of coal. But, no one cares about that—least of all Joe.

Nor are the songs he has written gems of poetic art. In Joe's Russia the Jews were not allowed to attend the Catholic schools. They had to support their own schools, and that took money. Joe couldn't go without money, so he didn't go. His education has been neglected. A clergyman once said, "Your songs are all right, Joe—but they're not dignified enough," to which Joe replied, "If you will come down to some meeting, Doctor, you will see dot my audience it is not very much dignified either!"

Although uneducated, Joe is intelligent—keen. He understands human nature, and he knows the Bowery from "hot dogs" to whiskey and from Penny Arcade to pawn-shop. His songs hit his congregation of "bums" exactly where they live. Hear him as he sings, "De Bowery Boy":

"Did you say de world's againsd you,
For dhey tell you you're too old,
Down and out you valked the streets
On many bitter Vinters cold.
Broke, I go, vile all around me,
Dhere is vealth to overflow,
Vat's de use of struggling longer,
I'll trow up de sponge and go."

And then, just when he has every bleary wreck in the audience saying "Yes, that's me," he swings, in an irresistible spirit of optimism into this chorus:

"Don'd lose hope and don'd despair,
Dhere's a God for you to care.
Don'd sit down in gloom and fret
Vile dhere's corn in Egypt yet.
Don'd look down in dark dismay,
Fondling troubles all de day.
Look for brighder days aheadt,
Jesu' lifts and luffs you yedt."

JOE has unshakable faith. One night he affirmed that he believed every word inside the Bible. A German heckler said, "I suppose you think you know all there is in that Bible."

"No," replied Joe, "I am no student; I haf not studied it as I shoul't like."

"And still you believe every word of it!"

"Yes, I belief efery vord of it."

"Well," said the heckler, "I'm a German and I'm proud of it—because Germans believe in being scientific. And if you don't know what's inside of that Bible, and yet you believe every word of it, all I want to say is that you're the biggest fool I ever saw," and he looked about for approval.

"Just von moment," said Joe. "You say you are a German?"

"Yes."

"Dhen I suppose you like frankfurters and sauerkraut?"

The German gave an affirmative grunt.

"Vell, now listen, my dear German fren'. Answer me dis question. Haf you effer studied de inside of a frankfurter?"

"No," growled the German.

"Vell," smiled Joe, "if you haf neffer studied de inside of a frankfurter, and still you eat dem—my dear fren'—dot's all I vant to say vit you!"

JOE gives even the hecklers a chance. He tries to get his audience to talk. His own remarks and songs are brief and his main effort is to induce the men to conduct their own meeting. Having often been made sick at heart when he has seen some uptown minister visiting a Bowery mission put every "bum" to sleep with an endless discourse, thus squandering a precious evening, Joe has felt moved to write a few epigrams of advice for visiting preachers. Here are some of them:

"Plenty of vind is a blessing to a vind-mill, but a calamity to a Gospel meeting."

"De fool hath said in his own heart, 'Lo, I am the anointed high-flyer in oratory.' De people said, von to anoder, 'Behold, a balloon filled vit hot air.'"

"Many are villing to stand up for Jesus but mighty few are villing to sit down again."

"It is more blessed to gif the rag to thy neighbor than to chew it thyself."

JOE, as you walk with him along the Bowery, is continually nodding here, throwing a word of greeting there, or stopping to speak with some friend. As you start on, he tells you of the friend he has just met. This one used to be a professor. But he was so at odds with the universe that no college could keep him. He drifted down until he reached the Bowery, where Joe met him. Always complaining, he would rail volubly at the President and Congress, and, if he had been Secretary of the Treasury, he would have sold government bonds in such and such a way. He could juggle with millions, but then he would say, "Joe, can't you lend me a nickel for a stew?" Joe, untutored teacher, has taught the professor the lesson of Christian good cheer, and the professor has learned how to work at a job without complaining himself out of it.

Another friend, Joe tells you, once had a fine house and had made the first payment on the mortgage. But then he began to take too much liquid refreshment. He could not make the second payment, and the mortgage was foreclosed. He speedily drank himself down and out. One night he sat on the curb, a bleary, red-nosed sot. Some one had given him a dime and he was trying to decide whether to spend it on more whiskey or a bed. He decided upon the whiskey—but before he could get to a dive, Joe caught him. The result was that a sister in a suburb received a request for a check which was spent on a new suit of clothes. With a bath, shave and haircut, a new suit of clothes and an inoculation of Joe's hopeful Christianity, this man presented himself at his former office, got his job back, and has kept straight ever since.

But one of the most interesting stories I have heard is the story of Joe himself as he told it while we walked up the Bowery one night about one a.m. between the darkened pawn-shops and dimly lighted twenty-cent hotels under the thundering elevated. Here is the story:

VELL, an anarchistic parade chased me into Christianity. It vas dwnty-seven years ago dot Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman hold a parade and a meeting on Union Square. They rail very much against de Government. It sound very good to me for it was noding but bad luck I have since I was come from R-R-Russia. I was dissatisfied. I give great sympathy vile I listen.

Dhen de police come—dhey break up de meeting—clubbing eferybody—dhey arrest de two speakers. I run for sweedt life. I keep on going down de Bowery tinkling always I hear somebody behindt. Then, just when I tink it safe, somebody grab my arm and I says to myself, "Now for a nighd in de cooler!" But it wasn'd a policeman. He say, "Come in!" I hear music—tought it was a place for amusements and say I haf no money. He says "You don't need money," and take me in. It vas a mission meeting. Dot was my first contact from Christianity. From being born a Jew, eferything mit me revolted against Christ and Christianity.

But, from curiosity, I vent again and again. I struggle nod to go, but a power I could nod explain draw me there time and time once more.

Dot was when I had a pardnership in booze vit an Irishman. I got a job in a pie factory in Brooklyn and in all de spare time I take my frendt around to de different saloons and treat him. It vas de ideal combination. De Jew furnish de money and de Irishman furnish de thirst. Efery nighd when we get full of booze and frankfurters he vould "carry de banner" (spend the night walking aimlessly up and down the Bowery) but I vould go to de mission.

Four times I break up de meeting. I vould argue vit de speaker. Always I tried to fight off de influence by protesting.

De last time dey took me by de collar—"You get out and don't you come in again." I vent out and saw de sign over de door, "God Bless you, come again." So next nighd I came again!

I USE to sit there half dozing. A man got up and said, "What shall it profit a man—" When I heard dot I voke up. You can't expect de Jew to sleep when he hears uf profit! De leader of de meeting dot nighd was a lady and she stood on de platform and said: "Salvation for the drunkard—salvation for the gambler—salvation for the thief—salvation for the drug fiend—salvation for everybody—"

Den she looked at me and she said "—salvation for the Jew!"

At de invitation I vent forward and gave my heart to God. I made a covenant to serf Him if He vould make a man out of me. God kept His part of de bargain and I'll try to keep my part.

I cleaned up, bought a boiled shirt and a collar—moved away from de Bowery to a furnished room at $1.25 a week—vent dish-washing in a restaurant—saved up $40 and vent in business for myself—lost my money and got married!

On my vedding day my wife didn't have 50 cents and I hadn't either. Ve got married on faith. Somebody gave six teaspoons and somebody an old stove.

It vas March and pretty cold. Ve had three rooms and a store—and von stove to heat dem all. In de morning I vould make fire in de store—in de evening, ven ve wanted to re-tire, I vould carry de red-hot stove, pipes and all, back into de bedroom—in de morning into de lifing room—den into de store again!

De Hebrew people vouldn't patronize, because my wife vas a Gentile. But in de day time I vent around vit a bag on my back soliziting laundry, and at night I vorked.

Today I haf a steam plant of my own—de Joseph Justice Laundry—I've a good business on Broadway and I'm prosperous and people call me up on the telephone and say, "Joe, come here," and, "Joe, come there"—I don't need to look for work—it come to me.

Salvation paid. I bring Him misery, He give me joy. I bring poverty, He give prosperity. I bring selfishness, He give de joy of doing something for de oder fellow. Dot is a good bargain—salvation is a paying business. De proof of its being good is dot a Hebrew has stuck to it for dwnty-seven years.

WHILE Joe had been telling his story, I had been watching the street we were following, and it was very evident that the need for Joe and his kind is not yet past on the Bowery.

Perhaps thoroughly enforced prohibition will some day clean up the Bowery. Unenforced prohibition has left it about as it was, except that Demon Rum hides his head slightly. But the "boys" know where to find him. And with an inundating wave of unemployment sweeping over the country, the drunken, jobless, hopeless, shivering waifs of the Bowery are to be numbered by thousands. If ever the humble ambassadors of faith, hope and love, like Joe the Jew, were needed on the Bowery, they are needed now.

A Pastor's Training and Troubles

A Plea for More Thorough Preparation for His Task

By FREDERICK A. AGAR

National Efficiency Secretary of the Northern Baptist Convention

THE average minister today, when he begins his life work as pastor of a local church, has immediate troubles and very little practical training to enable him to meet the host of difficulties that beset his path. Imagine anyone being willing to ride on a train, the engineer of which had no experience in running an engine. The church is more important and difficult to run than any train, yet its leader too often comes out of the theological school with little or no worth-while training for his task.

A professor in a well-known theological seminary said to me some time ago, "I tell my students very little about the practical difficulties they will have to face in the pastorate because they will realize them all too keenly as soon as they begin their actual work," which statement I understood to mean that he had no remedy for the pastor's troubles, and so he maintained silence about them for fear a frank discussion might lose the institution some students.

But even if this interpretation is not a correct one, it is a fact that the average ministerial student leaves the theological institution with an excellent scholastic training in one or more dead languages, church history, polemics, theology, Old and New Testament interpretation, some Bible-school pedagogy and practice, and what is known as pastoral theology, by which is meant the theory of the practice of his profession, and which in some cases has been accompanied by some harmless and limited supervised clinical features. It must be distinctly understood that this course is necessary and is to be recommended. Whatever may be said hereafter concerning the theological graduate applies with more weight to the large number of men entering the ministry of some communions who are without any higher education or theological training. Truly the last are more at a loss than the first.

A majority of the men entering the theological schools are from the rural or small town churches. Coming, then, from a circumscribed area into an educational atmosphere, without adequate or proper clinical opportunities, they often gain the idea that their chief task is spiritual and intellectual, instead of which it is a task in developing and then organizing Christian living and service, individual and collective. Not a thing of mind alone, but of life itself. Too often the result of such a seminary experience is to spoil the evangelistic ardor of the future minister.

It is painfully true that in all of the necessary mental training and consequent character building there is mingled very little proper technical knowledge of the task the minister is to confront during his professional career. Immediately he enters upon his work he must either continue in a rut worn by decades of half failure, or else he must plunge into a revolutionary campaign with no experimental knowledge to help him face his ever-present difficulties. If he chooses to travel in the rut, it is not long before he is engulfed in a chasm of precedents and is following in the line of least resistance, which leads to ministerial inertia. The ministry have often been accused of laziness because of this condition, but that is not a correct diagnosis in my judgment, for as a class they work hard over long hours. They suffer mainly from inertia, not laziness.

ALL of this leads me now to attempt an answer to the question, "What is the minister's life work?"

1. First of all, he is as a child of God through faith in Jesus Christ called to preach and teach the Word of the Lord.

2. Next, he is to be a minister to all people in the name of his Lord, "going about doing good."

3. Then, he is to be the under-shepherd of his flock; in other words he is to develop and project his church membership in the way and work of the Master.

4. Finally, he is to be the official representative or ambassador of his particular fold in the community where it is placed, and then also in other places, beyond where it can be useful.

In consideration of these four points there are some things of immense import to be remembered.

Preaching is not a bygone art or need. Thank God, the great majority of the ministry are still faithful preachers and teachers of the Word of the Living Lord. And contrary to the superficial idea in some quarters the spoken word is still a power, and every Lord's day attracts millions of people who go week after week to hear the same preacher speak upon a Bible text. But preaching is futile if it is merely inspirational, emotional and entertaining. In reality it is not the use of the spoken Word that is in question, but its abuse, and from the abuse of the pulpit arise many of the minister's troubles. Without the facts of the Gospel and the person of the Saviour all pulpit oratory is as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. The preacher is not meant to be a lecturer on hygiene, economics, sociology, medicine, law, or what-not, any more than the Bible, while containing some information on those topics, is a treatise on them, but primarily tells folks about God and how to live with Him in this everyday world. To me, therefore, there is a supernatural quality in all true preaching. The preacher must be fitted to be the channel for that supernatural power in the preaching of the Word of God, so that week after week as he lives in the world of people with God by his side he will have great fountains of spiritual refreshing with which to meet the needs of the people.

All people have spiritual needs and in their deep heart seek after God. Preaching, however, must not end in the pulpit any more than it begins there, but it must find its expressional side in the minister's life in the second phase of his work. Therefore the minister must constantly apply the Word to the sick, the afflicted, the young, the old, the repentant and the unrepentant sinner. The theological seminary should never graduate a man till he is an adept in personal ministry. You can train an average man to do about anything.

Dr. Lyman Abbott has truly said "The two great essential qualities of preaching are fellowship with God and sympathy with men." Folks need God and a Saviour and the preacher's task is not only to proclaim Him from the pulpit but also to minister in His name from person to person. These two functions go together and you will generally find them both present wherever there is a potent ministry in city or wayside.

WE COME now to consider the third phase of a minister's work, that of being the under-shepherd or leader of the flock, called the church membership.

In a recent article in the Christian Herald the writer pointed out that the minister was not hired to do the work of the church, but to teach and train the church membership in all the will and way of the Lord. Granted that the preaching and personal ministry of the pastor are of excellent quality, the church will be more or less of a failure, unless there is developed a sense of discipline and a large participation in work, the result of a nurture and culture in the art of Christian living. Many church members have heard a call to salvation from the pains and penalties of hell and they have supposedly entered the fold in answer to that call, but are useless to themselves or to the Lord. Ministers who have been sounding such a call have either been misrepresenting the Gospel or are guilty of obtaining something under false pretenses. Salvation is from something to something and the great task of the minister is to take those souls whom Christ has saved and see that they are disciplined for Christian living and service. This is a technical and scientific work.

At this point most of the minister's troubles generally arise and his training was clinically deficient to enable him to overcome his troubles. Consequently having no cure for his troubles he has used palliatives. This only confirms or aggravates the real trouble. The palliative in church life confirms a church boss in his autocratic selfish power so that even the minister is quite helpless to oppose him successfully. It perpetuates non-participation in church activities. It allows non-attendance to grow into open violation of Christian living.

Finally, and perhaps most important of all, the palliative puts the patient at ease in Zion when a lost world about him needs all he has, or can get, of God and righteousness to be passed on to others around him. In other words the church member must be trained into a disciplined individual, and then projected through proper organization into the task of making the world of folks around about him Christ-like through personal faith and loving works in the name of Jesus. This is a highly specialized technical task.

Many young ministers are early forced into wrong viewpoints and practices. They are made to please men because to displease some "pillar of the church" would develop dissension. And dissension when there is no sense of discipline is fearful. The physician does not have to please people; he gives them beastly medicine and sometimes the cruel knife, but there is a discipline to back him up.

BUT how can the minister cure when his so-called technical school has very little clinical work to teach him the science and art of healing the troubled church? Those who have entered the ministry without theological education are likely to be even worse off because they do not even possess mental discipline and are prone to fanaticism or over-emphasis. The minister must therefore act on theory or not at all, and so he allows matters to drift on as they are. There's the rub—drift on as they are. So let us frankly face the issue.

The Church has meant much to the world, much more than some people recognize. But the local church has never been scientifically studied as the medical profession has studied the human body. The human body and the church body have very much in common from a scientific and structural point of view, but the church is utterly unscientific in its approach to its united problems. In consequence decade after decade perpetuates those problems. By way of illustration let me cite one instance. Only a small per cent. of local churches today finance their operations from the standpoint of a unit. Most local churches still make from five to twenty financial approaches, continuously, for the support of the various departments, just as if they were not parts of the whole, doing one great task. You might just as well run a department store with each department financially independent of all others.

The science of organization has never been applied to the local church. Segments of the local body have applied some of these principles to the department activities until today the part is often greater than the whole, which is so full of multiplied forms of organization as to be unorganized in fact.

The local organization has no unified, generally accepted plans for the nurture and culture of its membership so that upon the basis of practical democracy it may secure participation in its services, its work and its finances from every member on the Gospel plan of "as God hath prospered." These are not my personal complaints, for many another minister has confirmed my own experience. Did not we all muddle our way over several pastorates while we learned lessons, through bitter experiences, which proper clinical training would have enabled us to solve promptly and without difficulty?

IN CONCLUSION may I put down some suggested remedies in a somewhat logical order?

First, a standard of requirements for the profession such as obtains in other profes-

Dr. Sheldon Discusses

Things the Pastor Sees from the Pulpit:

1. Some folks always coming in punctually late.
2. Others always in the same place where they seem to belong.
3. Some irreverence at the beginning of the service; not much, but some, and some is too much.
4. Strangers without any hymn books, and no one offering them any. It makes him feel nervous. How would you feel?
5. When the offering baskets are passed, some folks look at them as if they had never seen them before, and wondered what they were.
6. Once in a while a few people come in after the baskets are passed. I do not think they do it on purpose.
7. There are faces that are a benediction to look at, and a few, only a few, that seem to be mourning over the money they lost yesterday.
8. Once in a while a man, now and then a woman, who seems to be asleep; but appearances are deceptive.
9. Folks he has baptized, and married, and laughed with and cried with. He does not always see them distinctly.
10. And many other things he sees from the pulpit; and let us hope that most of the things he sees help him to preach when he rises to give his message.

sions which have both public and private responsibilities and functions.

In some quarters today there is a tendency to put a premium upon ignorance and lack of education, for fear that intellectual training will destroy the simple earnest faith of the minister in the Word of God and the Saviour Jesus Christ. In the long run it is safer to trust education rather than ignorance. Every minister needs ample education, both academic and clinical, and my plea is not for less education than the seminaries now give, but for more, the addition to be along clinical lines with standard requirements fixed by each communion.

To further show the need of such a standard of requirement let me cite a few instances. One communion under proper processes disciplined a minister for cause by taking away his ordination papers. He immediately found his way into the ministry of another communion. A decent horse doctor sought ordination, but was rejected by the denominational council, called to examine him, on the ground that he was not prepared to function as a minister and was too old to secure the needed education. He soon after went to a small negro church, was ordained by it and to all intents and purposes was able to perform the work of a minister, even among the churches whose council had previously rejected him. A man was converted, joined the local church and became a useful lay member. Though born in this country of American parentage he had not been graduated even from a grammar-school. Then he went to a so-called Bible-school, took a six months' course and was ordained while still unable to speak or read intelligibly the English language. I would be the first to give such a man every opportunity for service under the gospel plan, which happens to provide tremendous opportunities for lay service, without pushing him into a professional life where the need is for a most adequate and taxing preparation. To cite Moody in the face of this statement is to call to mind that one of Mr. Moody's great and lasting tasks was the development of two great educational institutions to help train ministerial students. We must also remember that Moody was constantly in a process of self-education.

NEXT we need the recasting of the work of the theological institutions in order to make them able to produce for the ministry what the medical and other technical schools produce for their respective professions. Our theological schools have worked under great handicaps and are generally to be commended for doing a real piece of academic work in the face of constant drawbacks, and the heads of those institutions would add to their clinical work overnight if the laity would produce the necessary money to meet the expense of the added work. Clinical work is expensive, particularly in its initial stages. The blame now does not rest upon the schools, but upon those who should properly support them but fail to do so.

I have often thought that the ministerial student should sustain the same relationship to his denomination that the cadet at Annapolis or West Point has to the United States. The Government provides for him and he in turn follows the course laid out with the object of producing the right sort of trained man. With such a plan men could be produced for many varied tasks with institutional churches, or rural fields or city missions or a family parish, all of which really need specialized training to develop competent leadership. Today many ministerial students have not the money to pay for the required education, so they perform various ministerial functions throughout their seminary course for the purpose of providing means of support and these technical functions are all performed without any professional oversight. The result is that the seeds of failure are often firmly planted before the real professional career has begun. This ought not to be permitted and would not be done except for the lack of money.

THIRD, the viewpoint of the average church member as to the qualifications and success of the minister must be changed from wrong to right ideas.

Ministerial success is to be judged by results and not by superficial indications. A salesman is judged by the orders he secures and not by the number of customers he waits upon. The manager of a mercantile or manufacturing concern is judged by the organization he builds up that can and does produce good results and not by the number of men employed or the hours he spends at work. The minister must be judged upon the same basis, but it must be remembered that he is dealing with real life in all its aspects, in a most tangible form, even if it is called spiritual or Christian. Too many people regard him as super-man dealing with unreal, unworldly spiritualizing things because his work in part has to do with the divine and supernatural. In reality he is directing human lives towards needed forces of great import and power which head up in the person of God revealed in Jesus Christ the Saviour. The final judgment therefore passed upon the minister is to be upon the basis of how real he makes God and Jesus Christ to men in a saving faith which reaches into every relationship and phase of life and makes of life a Christlike whole.

Truly a great task, a scientific supernatural task beset with many human difficulties, needing the best preparation but crowned in the end with joy unspeakable, and along the road with the presence of the Master Minister himself.

Interesting Children in the Church Service

JUST suppose, that you found it necessary—in fact, you were compelled—to sit for thirty minutes, forty minutes, or even fifty minutes and listen (?) to a man talk in a foreign language, say in Greek, or Russian, or Chinese. Would you enjoy yourself? Would you sit there with good grace and with pleasure, not understanding what the man was talking about?

Of course you wouldn't! You'd rebel. It would take a mighty force to compel you to do this once a week, wouldn't it?

Yet the parallel isn't far fetched when compared to your children, or to your neighbor's children, who have to go to church and listen to the minister preach. The average sermon is to them as Greek or Russian would be to you. They do not understand or appreciate what the speaker is talking about.

But because the average boy and girl cannot understand the sermon given from the pulpit on Sabbath is not sufficient excuse for their absence from church service. The remedy lies in devising ways and means of making the church service interesting to his mind and her mind. And it can and has been done.

Most people are agreed that regular churchgoing is a most desirable habit to have. When the habit is inculcated in children it is never entirely broken in after years. Besides the influence of the church service will be of inestimable value on the character and in the training of habits and desires. That is, the right sort of service will be helpful.

It is most important that the campaigns for "go to church" days include within their scope the young people, the juniors and particularly the children. It is self-evident that if the children are started right, it will not require the effort later to break up old habits or careless indifference.

In many parts of the country there is a most commendable movement to establish "children's churches." These are places where the children will enjoy and appreciate the lesson and where the sermon is adapted to their minds. In many places a definite part of the church service is made intelligible to the little ones. This is generally the first ten or fifteen minutes. This holds the children's attention, gives them something to think about and look forward to from week to week. It gives them the "momentum," so to speak, that will carry them more easily over the part of the sermon that is given for the older ones only.

OUT on the Pacific Coast one energetic Sabbath school superintendent whose school meets before the church services, interested himself in the problem of the juniors and the children and their attendance at the church services.

He had been noting how many of the boys and girls either went home at the beginning of the preaching service, or went off on questionable trips on the Sabbath, or hung about the streets waiting for their parents to come out of the service.

To assist in remedying this difficulty he had made up at a local bindery, blank books with heavy covers. These he gave to those who would promise to stay to the church services for that day. Through the superintendents of divisions he appealed to the boys and girls up to and including the junior ages to stay

How the Sermon May Be Made to Hold Their Attention to the preaching services, that followed the Bible school.

Giving the little books to the boys and girls he requested them to note certain references made by the minister and to write these down in their notebooks.

For instance, one Sabbath, they were to see if they could write down the texts given. On another time they were to note the number of allusions made to trees, or nature, or to events in the world, with perhaps a word or two about the thing noted. Another time, they were to write down the songs sung or at least some thought or sentiment from the hymns.

As the superintendent took an active interest in the matter each week by suggesting something that would be of general interest to all ages it stimulated attendance for the meeting following. It even had its effect on the parents. Many of the older ones were persuaded to come to church who might not have attended if it had not been for the special interest of the children.

From time to time rewards were offered to those who best carried out the suggestions. These were graded according to the ages of the children. The very smallest were stimulated to trace and to draw things, thin paper being provided, together with simple outline cards for them to use.

A Bird-Song

By

Minnie Leona Upton

A BIRD-SONG in a starless night,
Forth-gushing, like a crystal fountain
That finds its joyous way to light

From some dark cavern in a mountain—
Oh, sweet, and clear, and glad, and true,
It clef the heavy blackness through!

Was it a dream of dawn and dew,
Of home, of love, so joy-compelling
It woke you by its bliss, and drew
Your whole heart out, in music swelling,
And gave to me this pure delight?
A bird-song in a starless night!

It was most gratifying to the pastor, who was of course consulted, and who made suggestions according to the subject of his sermon. New ways and methods suggested themselves as the matter developed. It proved without question that the children were quick to respond to any simple plan by which they could relieve in ever so small a way the tedium of having to remain quiet. There is no way of estimating the amount of knowledge and inspiring moral and spiritual lessons obtained from the simple practice of having to listen carefully to the minister in order to note the particular things for which they were watching.

It may be suggested that such a plan does not consider the reverence with which the church should be held. But is it not better to instruct the lambs of the flock or even to cause them to be occupied than to have them grow up with an ever-increasing dislike for the church and the services of the Lord's house?

IN ANOTHER church the mothers took the matter in hand and through the church's Friendship Band they arranged to have the children file out quietly during the hymn just preceding the sermon. They would go to one of the Bible school-rooms where under the charge of an experienced children's worker they would enjoy a little talk given in a manner that they could appreciate.

Still other methods have been used with success. Small picture-books of Bible scenes that permit the adding of new pictures each week and are used only during the church services have been used with success.

Little bunches of papers given out in the Bible school have been fastened together and these used as something to add to the interest of the morning's exercise.

The children must be doing something. If they are not kept busy with something good, they will surely occupy themselves with something questionable.

With a well-defined plan for providing for the children during the church services, the older members will obtain greater spiritual help and benefit from the hour spent in the house of God. What a relief such things are to the parents who spend moments of torture to keep active little ones quiet during the sermon! What a relief it is to the people who are annoyed by the restlessness of the little ones! What a relief it is to the pastor and the speaker who can see everything that is going on.

Children who are occupied pleasantly and profitably during the preaching hour will soon learn to love the church—not to dread it. They will obtain the idea that the church is there for them too, for it becomes attractive and of real interest. A habit is formed without conscious effort in such churches that in after life will carry the man and his family and possibly his friends to church with him each week. This will be of benefit to the man who attends, and will have its influence on the civil life of the community and the town in which he lives.

The effect of using a little effort in planning carefully for the children; in helping them to LIKE the church and its services is far reaching in its ultimate end. Its cumulative value becomes of interest even to the state and the nation.

America's Mystery Monuments

Mayan Ruins Baffle Archaeologists

By RUTH LAUGHLIN BARKER

WHO were you? What do your inscriptions mean? Are you all that is left of American civilization? These are the questions one asks of the giant stones which loom through the solitudes of the Guatemalan jungle. "Why were you?" one asks again. "Quién sabe," mock the parrots in the high trees overhead.

Fifty-seven miles inland, on the Atlantic coast of Guatemala, tangled in the mass of tropical vegetation, these monuments of the long-forgotten Mayans have been discovered. Vaguely we know that the Mayans were conquerors of Central America a thousand, perhaps two thousand, years before the first Spaniards carried their flag into this area in 1541. They may be classed with their neighbors, the Aztecs, just north of them in Mexico, and the Incas to the south in Peru, in their culture and arts, but of their history we know even less than of these other ancient American civilizations. The monuments rival the best Egyptian sculpture by their deep carvings, but unlike the Egyptian hieroglyphics, which tell the story of each Sphinx, the meaning of the Mayan symbols is still mostly a riddle.

Men, gigantic in their proportions and ornaments, are carved upon the two wider sides of the sandstone pillars. The narrower sides are covered with inscriptions, the stone chapters of Mayan history, which are no more communicative than the stone itself. Hundreds of hieroglyphs, but no key to their meaning! The serial story of the first American heroes, but no one to explain the romance! The conquering Spaniards burned every manuscript they could find, calling them "books of the devil." One or two escaped this bonfire, having been taken into Mexico, and by puzzling over these archaeologists have pieced out the date symbols, giving an approximate date, for instance, to this tallest monument of the year 520 A.D.

520 A.D.! When Europe was still in the chaos which followed the fall of the Roman Empire and the great nations of today were still only barbaric tribes. In those days Americans were carving feathered head ornaments with grace and skill which we could not exceed today, with great cities rivaling Pompeii and Athens, with a calendar computed upon astronomy and higher mathematics! We are just beginning to find out the romances of America, to turn back those stone pages of our history which makes the tales of the Pharaohs sound like nursery rhymes.

RESCUING these cities lost in the jungle has been undertaken by the School of American Research. It has been a game between the brains and tools of man and the never-ceasing growth of the jungle which, like a giant octopus, has sent out its multitude of creeping arms to cover every bare inch of earth or stone or bark with its green meshes. There are two seasons in the jungle—the wet and the very wet. It was only possible for man to work during February, March and April, but the jungle works twelve months filling with green the trenches which have been dug to find the buried marble walls. When the first expedition reached the once-busy city square of Quirigua, they saw only a vast forest as high as a ten-story building, with monkeys chattering in the highest branches and tigers slinking away through the shadows. The monuments stood out like enormous thumbs bandaged in lichen a foot thick. The temples were green mounds with mahogany trees growing upon their roofs. Burning these trees and excavating in this tropical growth was a hazardous job, for the scarlet-circled snakes resented having their homes disturbed.

The faces continued their Sphinx-like smile even after man had scraped away their green masks, for the story of their lives was still locked behind stone lips. There are thirteen of these figured monuments at Quirigua, all but one of them representing men. Were they kings, priests or prophets? Their dignity and stoical calm impress one with the spirit of peace. The feathers of the quetzal, the sacred bird of the Mayans, two grotesque masks and a skull form the high head-dress, which is not symbolical of a battle helmet, nor does the manikin wand, which is the insignia of office, typify the war lord. Evidently these august personages were priest-chiefs who dominated their subjects as religious rulers.

TEMPLES bounded the central plaza on four sides. They were built upon earth-filled pyramids with twenty-five steps leading up to the temple portico, around whose cornice ran a frieze ornamented with human and grotesque faces as well as a long series of hieroglyphs. Portrait heads in white sandstone were fastened to the inner walls, looking like crazed prisoners who had been trying to free themselves for centuries. In one temple cell was found a long coffin-like box containing a terra-cotta vase, with human heads in high relief, and gold figurines, half human and half animal. Whether these temples and coffins were burial places for priest-chiefs who succeeded the ones on the tall monuments is only one of the puzzling questions.

Cutting away the dense jungle growth from the ruins of an ancient Mayan temple

"The Queen," a favorite subject of the Mayan artists

One of the lofty monuments which shows the elaborate art of this vanished civilization

The one tall monument most often representing a human is of rare interest, for it would indicate that in those faraway days the American women had the rights of equal suffrage. This monument represents a woman who ruled over one of the jungle cities of Central America in the year 535 A.D., according to the computations of the archaeologists.

"The Queen" was the last of a line of Mayan rulers, and the monument is, so the meager reading of the inscription would indicate, her own portrait. Little is known of her history, but it is noteworthy that she holds the same official manikin wand in her hand which the men carry, so she must have held the same office.

Vanity, as old as the jungle behind her, displays itself in the "Queen's" high feathered head-dress, in the huge ear-rings, in the jewelled bar from which her cape hangs, and even in the elaborate sandals which cover her ankles. Her face, in its round contour, is the most interesting of those found at Quirigua, though she does seem to be a little overburdened with her official trappings. Evidently the Oriental idea of beauty prevailed among the Mayans, for this queen was certainly not a slim princess.

Other monuments, which would show that equal suffrage was tolerated in this long-forgotten jungle city, show the figures of women rulers seated between the wide jaws of prehistoric animals carved out of great blocks of reddish sandstone. The Mayans worshiped mythological animals, the sun, moon and stars and all the forces of Nature. Many of these monuments have been destroyed by the jungle storms of twenty centuries and by the roots of trees which have broken the stone apart.

FOUR of them are fairly well preserved, and these have been named the Tiger, the Dragon, the Frog, and the Turtle. The sculptor seems to have wished to give the animal-gods some of the attributes without making the whole conception too realistic.

On the "frog" the spotted legs and scaly call attention to the zoomorphic form, but the

CHAPTER XVII

A Serial

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ROSE-MARIE for a moment was stunned by the child's unexpected cry. She hung speechless, filled with wonderment, in Jim's arms. And then, with a wrench, she was free—was running across the floor to the little huddled bundle that was Lily.

"You beast," she flung back, over her shoulder, as she ran. "You beast! You've killed her!"

Jim did not attempt to follow—or to answer. He had wheeled about, and his face was very pale.

"God!" he whispered, in a tense whisper, "God!" It was the first time that the word, upon his lips, was neither mocking nor profane. It was a recognition.

Rose-Marie, with tender hands, gathered the child up from the hard floor. She was not thinking of the miracle that had taken place—she was not thinking of the sound that had come, so unexpectedly, from dumb lips. She only knew that the child was unconscious, perhaps dying. Her trembling fingers felt of the slim wrist; felt almost with apprehension. She was surprised to feel that the pulse was still beating, though faintly.

"Get somebody," she said tersely to Jim. "Get somebody who knows something!"

Jim's face was still the color of ashes. He did not stir—did not seem to have the power to stir.

"Did yer hear her?" he mouthed thickly. "She yelled. I heard her. Did yer hear—"

Rose-Marie was holding Lily close to her breast. Her stern young eyes looked across the drooping golden head into the scared eyes of the man.

"It was God speaking through her," she said. "It was God. And you—you had denied Him—you beast!"

ALL at once Jim was down upon the floor beside her. The mask of passion had slipped from his face—his shoulders seemed suddenly more narrow—his cruel hands almost futile. Rose-Marie wondered, subconsciously, how she had ever feared him.

"She yelled," he reiterated, "did yer hear her—"

Rose-Marie clutched the child tighter in her arms.

"Get some one, at once," she ordered, "if you don't want her to die—if you don't want to be a murderer!"

But Jim had not heard her voice. He was sobbing, gustily.

"I'm t'rough," he was sobbing; "t'rough! Oh—God, forgive—"

It was then that the door opened. And Rose-Marie, raising eyes a-brim with relief, saw that Ella and Mrs. Volsky and Bennie stood upon the threshold.

"What's a-matter?" questioned Mrs. Volsky, her voice sodden with grief. "What's been a-happenin'?" But Ella ran across the space between them, and knelt in front of Rose-Marie.

"Give 'er t' me!" she breathed fiercely; "she's my sister. Give 'er t' me!"

Silently Rose-Marie handed over the light little figure. But, as Ella pillowed the disheveled head upon her shoulder, she spoke directly to Bennie.

"Run to the Settlement House, as fast as ever you can!" she told him, "And bring Dr. Blanchard back with you. Hurry, dear—it may mean Lily's life!" And Bennie, with his grimy face tear-streaked, was out of the door and clattering down the stairs before she had finished.

Ella, her mouth agonized and drawn, was the first to speak after Bennie left the room. When she did speak she asked a question.

"Who done this t' her?" she questioned. "Who done it?"

Rose-Marie hesitated. She could feel the eyes of Mrs. Volsky, dumb with suffering, upon her—she could feel Jim's rat-like gaze fixed, with a certain appeal, on her face. At last she spoke.

"Jim will tell you!" she said.

IF SHE had expected the man to evade the issue—if she had expected a downright falsehood from him—she was surprised. For Jim's head came up, suddenly, and his eyes met the burning dark ones of his sister.

"I done it," he said, simply, and he scrambled up from the floor, as he spoke.

"I kicked her. She come in when I was tryin' t' kiss—" his finger indicated Rose-Marie, "her. Lily got in th' way. So I kicked out hard—then—she," he gulped back a shudder, "she yelled!"

Ella was suddenly galvanized into action. She was on her feet, with one lithe panther-like movement—the child held tight in her arms.

"Yer kicked her," she said softly—and the gentleness of her voice was ominous—"Yer kicked her! An' she yelled—" suddenly and for the first time the full significance of it struck her. "She yelled?"

she questioned, whirling to Rose-Marie; "yer don't mean as she made a sound?"

Rose-Marie nodded dumbly. It was Jim's voice that went on with the story.

"She ain't dead," he told Ella, piteously. "She ain't dead. An'—I promise yer true—I'll never do such a thing again. I promise yer true!"

Ella took a step toward him. Her face was suddenly lined and old. "If she dies," she told him; "if she dies . . ." she hesitated and then—"Much yer promises mean," she shrilled, "much yer promises mean—"

Rose-Marie had been watching Jim's face. Almost without intending to she interrupted Ella's flow of speech.

"I think that he means what he says," she told Ella slowly; "I think that he means . . . what he says."

For she had seen the birth of something—that might have been a soul—in Jim's haggard eyes.

THE child in Ella's arms stirred, weakly, and was still again. But the movement, slight as it was, made the girl forget her brother. Her dark head bent above the fair one.

"Honey," she whispered, "yer goin' ter get well fer Ella—ain't yer? Yer goin' ter get well—"

The door swung open with a startling suddenness. And Rose-Marie sprang forward, her hands outstretched. For, framed in the battered wood stood Bennie—the tears still streaking his face—and behind him stood the Young Doctor. So tall he seemed, so capable, so strong, standing there, that Rose-Marie felt as if her troubles had been lifted, magically, from her shoulders. All at once she ceased to be afraid—ceased to question the ways of the Almighty. All at once she felt that Lily would not die—that the Volskys would be saved to a better life. And all at once she knew something else. And the consciousness of it looked from her wide eyes.

"You!" she breathed. "You!"

The Young Doctor's glance in her direction was eloquent. But as his eyes saw the child in Ella's arms his expression became impersonal again, and concentrated and alert. With one stride he had reached Ella's side, and taken the tiny figure from her arms.

"What's the matter here?" he questioned sharply.

Rose-Marie was not conscious of the words that she used as she described Lily's accident. She glossed as lightly as possible over Jim's part in it; she told, as quickly as she could, the history of the child. And as she told it, the doctor's lean capable hands were passing, with a practiced skill, over the little relaxed body. When she told of the child's deaf and dumb condition she was conscious of his absolute attention, though he did not for a moment stop his work; when she spoke of the scream she saw his start of surprise. But his only words were in the nature of commands. "Bring water," he ordered, "clean water in a basin. A clean basin. Bring a sponge—" he corrected himself—"a clean rag will do—only it must be clean—" this to Mrs. Volsky, "you understand? Where," his eyes were on Ella's face, "can we lay the child? Is there a clean bed, anywhere?"

ELLA was shaking with nervousness as she opened the door of the inner room that she and Lily shared. Mrs. Volsky, carrying the basin of water, was sobbing. Jim, standing in the center of the room was like a statue—only his haunted eyes were alive. The Young Doctor, glancing from face to face, spoke suddenly to Rose-Marie.

"I hate to ask you," he said simply, "but you seem to be the only one who hasn't gone to pieces. Will you come in here with me?"

Rose-Marie nodded. And she spoke very softly, "Then you think that I'll be able—to help?" she questioned.

The Young Doctor was remembering—or forgetting—many things.

"I know that you will!" he said, and he spoke as softly as she had spoken, "I know that you will!"

They went together with Lily into the inner room. And as the Young Doctor closed the door, Rose-Marie knew a very real throb of triumph. For the Young Doctor had admitted that her help was to be desired—that she could really do something!

But the moment that the door closed she forgot her feeling of victory. For, of a sudden, she saw Dr. Blanchard in a new light. She saw him lay the little figure upon the bed—she saw him peel off his coat. And then, while she held the basin of water, she saw him get down to work. And as she watched him her last feeling of doubt was swept away.

"He may say that he's not interested in people," she told herself joyously, "but he is. He may think that he doesn't care for religion—but he does. There's love of people in every move of his hands! There's something religious in the very way his fingers touch Lily!"

YES, she was seeing the Young Doctor in a new light. As she watched him she knew that he had quite forgotten her presence—had quite forgotten the little quarrels that had all but ruined their chance at friendship. She knew that his mind was only on the child who lay so still under his hands; she knew that all the intensity of his nature was concentrated upon Lily. As she watched him, deftly obeying his simple directions, she gloried in his skill—in his surety.

And then, at last, Lily opened her eyes. She might have been waking from a deep slumber as she opened them—she might have been dreaming a pleasant dream as she smiled faintly. Rose-Marie had a sudden feeling—a feeling that she had experienced before—that the child was seeing visions, with her great sightless eyes, that other, normal folk could not see. All at once a great dread clutched at her soul.

"She's not dying—?" she whispered, gaspingly. "Her smile is so very—sweet! She's not dying?"

The Young Doctor turned swiftly from the bed. All at once he looked like a knight to Rose-Marie—an armorless, modern knight who fought an endless fight against the dragons, Disease and Pain.

"Bless your heart, no!" he answered. "She isn't dying! We'll bring her around in a few minutes. And now—" a great tenderness shone out of his eyes, "tell me all about it. You were very sketchy," his gesture indicated the other room, "out there! How did the child really get hurt—and how did you come to be here? How—Why, Rose-Marie . . . Sweet-heart!"

For Rose-Marie had fainted very quietly—and for the first time in all of her strong young life.

CHAPTER XVIII

THEY were sitting together at the luncheon table—the Superintendent and Rose-Marie and the Young Doctor. The noontime sunshine slanted across the table, dancing on the silver spoons, touching softly Rose-Marie's curls, finding an answering sparkle in the Young Doctor's smile. And silence, the warm silence of happiness, lay over them all.

It was the Young Doctor who broke the silence.

"Just about a month ago, it was," he said reflectively, "that I saw Lily for the first time. And now—" he paused teasingly—"and now—"

Rose-Marie laid down the bit of roll that she was buttering. Her face was glowing with eagerness.

"They've come to some decision," she whispered, in a question that was little more than a breath of sound; "the doctors at the hospital have come to some decision?"

The Superintendent was leaning forward and her kind soul shone out of her tired eyes. "Tell us at once, Billy Blanchard!" she ordered; "at once!"

Quite after the maddening fashion of men the Young Doctor did not answer—not until he had consumed, and appreciatively, the bit of roll that he had been buttering. And then—

"The other doctors agree with my

Minster Aisles

By ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

PEACE dwells in mountain temples of the sky,
Vast aisles where mortal footsteps never fall,
Where song is hushed and only great winds call
The stars to worship as the sunsets die.
Peace dwells where wastes of water lie,
Forever held by ruling moons in thrall,
And still save where on some coast's rocky wall
With intonations faint the breakers cry.

But here within these minster aisles is peace,
A sweeter peace than that of peak or sea,
A peace made holy by a presence dear.
Here dies the stress of life, its strivings cease,
Frail human hearts touch immortality,
And souls are comforted since He is near!

Real Disarmament

IN THE case of international disarmament, "Barkis is willin'" if the other nation is. Up to date, Japan says if the United States will take steps to disarm, with Great Britain joining, she is willing to come in.

Great Britain says the same, if Japan and America will disarm. The United States is going ahead on her own account to register public opinion, as shown by the action of the Appropriation Committee in the House in cutting down the sum requested for the army of $690,000,000, to $370,000,000—a 50 per cent. reduction. This indicates a saving of $320,000,000 to the taxpayers annually.

All this is encouraging. There is a growing sentiment among the people of this country for actual disarmament. Now is the time to add to this growing conviction until the reality of disarmament is made history, a history that will mark an epoch in civilization beyond all imagination for the world's welfare.

What the World Needs Is Prayer

AT THIS time, when all the Christian denominations and the great Prayer Leagues are uniting in a campaign of prayer, the suggestion is made that the principal evangelical agencies in the United States should agree on the adoption of specific petitions which are of the highest spiritual importance. It has been well said that "Nothing lies beyond the reach of prayer except that which lies outside the will of God." It is obvious, therefore, that first of all, our petitions should be that we might be led to ask only those things that are accordant with His will. We can then make our requests with the spirit of entire confidence, knowing that if we ask only those things that we ought to ask, He will hear and answer. The following have been suggested to the Christian Herald as fitting subjects of prayer at the present time—

That the nations may be led to lay aside their weapons of war and turn to peace;

That race hatred between the peoples may disappear, and good-will and love be manifested instead;

That the Church, and all evangelical organizations, may receive a baptism of the Spirit, with energy to press forward in the work of world evangelization;

That the madness of pleasure-seeking and wicked indulgence may cease, and that our people may be led into the ways of uprightness and good Christian citizenship;

That the efforts now being made in our land to relieve the world's starving nations may be abundantly successful, and that such generosity may be inspired with the Christ Spirit, which seeks to save both soul and body;

That there may come a genuine nation-wide spiritual revival throughout our land, with a great harvest of souls, and that our churches may be united more closely in the bonds of brotherhood and Christian love, and so be able to render more effective service in bringing in the multitudes;

That all in authority in the Nation, the States, and in communities may be guided by the desire for uprightness and justice.

In addition to the churches themselves, various evangelical bodies have taken an active part in the present movement, notably the Great Commission Prayer League, of Chicago, the Christian Herald Prayer League with membership in all the States, and the Moody Bible Institute. These and many others are waiting in faith for a great outpouring of the Spirit not only upon our own nation, but the people of other lands. The Christian Herald invites all of its readers to join their prayers with those of these organizations. This is the most important duty that can occupy the minds of men at the present time, because prayer means the realization and utilization of the presence and power of God in our daily lives.

Some Japanese Facts

RACE feeling and race prejudice are as old as the human race, and at times it seems as if the strength of it was as great and violent as ever. It is one of the oldest and one of the hardest human passions to overcome.

The Japanese have for various reasons been hated and suspected by the other nations. We are not taking time here to state what seem to be the reasons for that hatred. But it is certainly in order at all times to do and say anything that will make friends instead of enemies and create an atmosphere of good-will instead of ill-will among the different peoples of the earth who have to occupy the sphere at the same time. It certainly is out of order for the good of civilization to continue to create a condition of suspicion and ill-will among the different races of mankind.

We are constantly told that the Japanese immigration is so rapidly increasing, even under the "Gentlemen's Agreement" of 1907, that in a very short time we shall be swamped with these undesirable aliens, and labor and industry generally which cannot compete with low standards, will be imperilled.

But in the case even of California, where the fear of a Japanese flood is most felt, the Japanese population is only 70,196 as compared with a total population of the State, which is 3,426,861. This is an increase of population for California of 1,049,312 in the last ten years, while the Japanese population has increased only 28,838 in the same period. Surely this is no cause for excessive fear of an alien race.

Much has been said about the danger of letting the Japanese get possession of the land, and stories have been circulated that in a very few years the Japanese would have possession of the best land of California.

The facts show that by the figures of the State Board of Control the Japanese at the present time are cultivating 458,056 acres, most of it under short-term leases. Of this amount they own 74,769 acres. California has an area of about 28,000,000 acres of farm land. Of this only 1.6 per cent. is cultivated by the Japanese. On this small per cent. they produce, however, 13 per cent. of California's total food product. This produce is valued at $67,000,000 of which 35 per cent. is paid to landowners as rental and 45 per cent. to laborers, and the Japanese tenants or contractors receive 20 per cent.

The new law of November, 1920, prohibits Japanese from buying or leasing farm land. And also forbids them from making any investment in any California corporation owning agricultural land. Ten organizations opposed this law, including the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, Stockton Labor Council, Sacramento Federated Trades Council, American Committee of Justice, and various Christian organizations.

There are 72 churches and preaching places among the Japanese in California, and about 2,500 church members. Dr. Henry Wadsworth Kinney, superintendent of schools in Hawaii, says of the desire of the Japanese to acquire American ideals and standards, "The Japanese educated in the public schools eagerly grasp American ideals and standards. They have a tendency to feel that a knowledge of English and absorption of Western civilization places them on a higher plane than that occupied by their parents." The bad side of any race, including our own, can easily be shown. Let us give the good side of the races in our dealing with the question.

Apply the Remedy

PEOPLE are constantly writing to the editor complaining of the bad picture-shows in their town. They want to know what to do to make these places decent for the average family that would like to encourage good films, and also feel sure, when any of their young people wanted to attend a picture-show that it would be respectable and safe for them to go. But these people never seem to understand that the remedy for the bad film rests with the public which goes to see it. The most powerful agency for correcting the abuses of the picture-house is not legislation nor censor boards nor public attacks in the press or the pulpit, but the remedy lies with the people themselves. To illustrate:

The Dean of the women in a Western co-educational college recently took to a picture-house two of her girls to see a film which was advertised to be clean and wholesome. After the usual advertisements and news pictures had been thrown on the screen, a company of so-called vaudeville artists came out and began a vulgar dialogue. It became so bad as it went on that the Dean decided to leave the house, and taking the college girls with her, she left the seats, and on the way out asked to see the manager. The manager was in his office back of the moving-picture machine, and the Dean, taking the students with her, had the following conference:

The Dean. "I came down here with two of the students of the college to see the picture which you advertised as clean and wholesome. We have just been listening to a dialogue that is so vulgar that I do not want to hear it, and certainly do not wish the students to hear it. That is the reason I am leaving this place with them."

The Manager. "I did not know the vaudeville people had any dialogue. I hired them to sing. I will not allow them to repeat the dialogue. It will not occur again."

The Dean. "I thank you. We appreciate that."

The Manager. "You may depend upon it that I will do as I say. The dialogue will not occur again."

The next night the Dean sent the two students down to the place again. The vaudeville people sang, but the objectionable dialogue was cut out. And it did not appear again in that town.

It took less than five minutes to make this protest in the name of decency. The manager did just what nearly every manager of a picture-house would do if any number of his patrons filed a serious objection to a bad film. If he was unable to act owing to contracts with large companies, he would file his complaint and the film companies would have to take notice of a public criticism. It is safe to say that in any town where bad or questionable films are being shown, if a dozen good citizens would rise from their places and go out of the house, registering with the manager as they went out their reasons for leaving, in a very short time the film companies would take notice and the character of the films would undergo a very decided change for the better. But if good people will continue to sit through the exhibition of poor films and make no protest, because they are cowards or do not want to be thought odd or peculiar, just so long the bad films will continue. The public holds the remedy for about all the ills from which it suffers. Let it apply the remedy.

All Watching Prohibition

IF PROHIBITION is enforced in New York City as thoroughly as it is in other parts of America, the entire world will follow in our footsteps; but if America fails civilization at this supreme moment, the cause of Prohibition is dead for a hundred years."

These brief words were spoken by William E. Johnson (the man who lost an eye in the cause of Prohibition in England) at a recent meeting of the Ministers' Union in New York City. They set before the American people, in a single graphic sentence, the Prohibition situation today. Prohibition is the law of the land and must be enforced. Partially enforced it will inevitably run the risk of being set down as a failure; but with the full co-operation of Federal, state, and municipal authorities, its success is assured.

Europe's statesmen are watching with growing interest the progress of the drinking reform in America. Premier Lloyd George is quoted as expressing the conviction that if our campaign here wins, as it ought to, England will follow our example by adopting Prohibition within ten years.

Uncle Sam and the Taxpayer

UNCLE SAM: See, our last new battleship cost $32,000,000.

Taxpayer: Yes, I see it. Also feel it. For I helped pay for it.

Uncle Sam: Also look at the equipment, ammunition and coal, and feeding and paying several hundred men and officers. Several million more every year.

Taxpayer: Yes, I see that too, for I help to keep this thing going.

Uncle Sam: What do you think of it?

Taxpayer: I'm not so proud of a $32,000,000 battleship as I used to be a few years ago. In fact, know several million of me in this and other countries who feel as I do. How much longer are you going to make them?

Uncle Sam: As long as you taxpayers want me to.

Taxpayer: Put me down right now as not wanting any more. Let's see. $32,000,000 is some sum. There are 45,000,000 Chinese men, women and children starving to death. $6 will keep a human being alive until next harvest. $32,000,000 will keep from dying 5,333,333 people. You may take my part of the $32,000,000 battleship and use it to save instead of to kill.

Uncle Sam: How many more taxpayers are there like you?

Taxpayer: I don't know. But I believe most of us feel the same way.

Uncle Sam: But you have 7 cents on every dollar paid me, to keep up your household expenses, education, good roads, child welfare, post-office, Congress and all the rest. And only 93 cents is spent on what war has cost us.

Taxpayer: Let me get that. 93 and 7. 93 and 93 and 7. I won't forget it.

Uncle Sam: I am getting ready to build another $32,000,000 battleship; unless you countermand my order. What do you say?

Taxpayer: I'll think it over. Meanwhile, I don't want to forget that. 93 and 7. My money, too, that you are spending. I'll think it over.

Allies Tentatively Fix German Indemnity After Heated Clashes

ATTEMPTS by the Allied premiers, meeting in Paris, to fix the total of the reparation payments to be demanded from Germany have evoked heated clashes between the French and British leaders, but a tentative agreement on a basis of settlement finally was reached.

M. Doumer, the French Finance minister, had claimed as the French share of the indemnity the sum of 112,000,000,000 gold marks, or about $28,000,000,000. As her share has been fixed tentatively at 55 per cent, that would mean a principal of 200,000,000,000 for Germany to pay. With interest the total would run up to twice this figure.

The British refused to accept this demand, declaring Germany would be unable to pay, and the French modified their figures through the intervention of President Millerand, who had accepted at the Boulogne conference, while France's premier, a more moderate basis of settlement.

The Allied experts agreed that Germany shall pay over 42 years a series of annuities ranging from 2,000,000,000 to 6,000,000,000 gold marks, and the scale of payment favored would yield a grand total of 220,000,000,000 gold marks (normally $55,000,000,000). In addition to this, Germany would pay for the 42 years a 12½ per cent. tax on the total of her export trade.

This plan had to be approved finally by the Allied Supreme Council and by the governments constituting it, which in the case of France probably will be accomplished only after a severe parliamentary fight. Then negotiations with Germany will be necessary, since it changes the terms of the Versailles treaty providing for payment in thirty years. The question of reparations thus is far from being settled.

Premier Lloyd George of Great Britain insisted on the necessity of an immediate settlement and declared it was better to have a partial solution now than an ideal settlement later. In this he was supported by the Italian and Belgian representatives, who opposed the inauguration of a new system of payments as likely to unsettle the whole world.

Announcement was made in Berlin that the German Government agreed to the plan of five yearly instalments as a basis for further negotiations, and would waive insistence that the total of the indemnity be fixed now, but wished the total to be fixed during the five-year period instead of later.

Wilson Urges Pledge to Russia

PRESIDENT WILSON has proposed to the Great Powers, through the League of Nations, a solemn engagement "not to take advantage of Russia's stricken condition and not to violate the territorial integrity of Russia, nor to undertake themselves any further invasions of Russia, nor to tolerate such invasions by others." The idea was presented in connection with the discussion of how the President best could mediate in behalf of Armenia, which now is virtually under the control of Soviet Russia. Mr. Wilson held that the Armenian situation was only a detail of the Bolshevik problem and that it was futile to seek a solution for Armenia's difficulties without attempting a general and comprehensive treatment of the entire Russian situation.

Reiterating his hostility toward the Bolsheviks, the President called attention to the instability and unrest along the Russian border, due to the fear of new wars, and declared the great impediment to peaceful reconstruction in those troubled territories was caused by the utter confusion between defense and offense. The small border states, he said, would not attack Russia unless encouraged by the Great Powers and he urged the Powers to pledge themselves to maintain peace, so that the blame for any hostilities on the Russian frontier might be placed squarely on the Soviet government.

If the Powers will pledge their moral and diplomatic support in this matter, President Wilson promised to instruct Henry Morgenthau, his personal representative in the Armenian matter, to proceed at once on his mission.

State Department officials believed the President's move would have a beneficial effect on the peasant and other anti-Bolshevik masses throughout Russia, and the comments of Russians in foreign countries were favorable. The Great Powers delayed their answers, and responsible officials were slow to express any opinion which would give an indication of their attitude regarding the President's note. The London press was inclined to be hostile. The Brazilian Ambassador in Washington informed the State Department to Japan, and Baron Shidehara, Japanese Ambassador to America, and their recommendations now await the action of their governments. The Morris report was on the desk of Secretary Colby when he returned to Washington from his visits of state to South American countries, and contained a lengthy review of Japanese-American relations for thirty years.

As had been forecast, the principal features of the agreement provide for an amendment of the existing commercial treaty between the United States and Japan so as to grant to Japanese subjects equal rights with the nationals of any other foreign country and for the revision of the present "gentlemen's agreement" so as to make it conform to present-day requirements, absolutely prohibiting Japanese emigration to the United States and Hawaii and admitting Japanese immigrants to the Philippine Islands. It is not the idea, however, that Japanese shall receive American citizenship.

The conferences between the Ambassadors were informal and are not binding on either government, but the foreign office of each capital has been in close touch with the negotiations and is expected to approve. When Tokio has given its approval, the matter will be taken up with President Wilson, who will decide whether to submit the treaty changes to the Senate at the present session or to allow the agreement to await the action of the incoming administration. It was considered almost certain that final action would be delayed until after Mr. Harding has taken office.

Japanese-American Agreement Ready

NEGOTIATIONS to settle the California alien land question and to define the rights of Japanese in the United States have been concluded successfully by Roland S. Morris, American Ambassador to Japan, and Baron Shidehara, Japanese Ambassador to America, and their recommendations now await the action of their governments. The Morris report was on the desk of Secretary Colby when he returned to Washington from his visits of state to South American countries, and contained a lengthy review of Japanese-American relations for thirty years. New Riots in Italy

A FRESH outburst of rioting, verging on civil war, broke out in the cities of central and northern Italy simultaneously with Premier Giolitti's announcement of his plan for redeeming his pledge to the workers for joint control of the larger industries.

Socialist and Nationalist mobs clashed in several cities, and the casualties were numbered by the score. The Chambers of Labor in Bologna and Modena, both splendid buildings, were burned by Nationalist mobs, and the situation became so serious that the government issued drastic decrees which applied to the whole of Modena, Ferrara and Bologna, revoking all permits for the carrying of firearms and ordering steps for the immediate disarmament of the population.

Premier Giolitti's bill for establishing the principle of control failed to give a formal definition of the much-debated word "control," but its objects were explained as aiming to familiarize the workers with industrial conditions, to better their status, to improve production and to establish more normal and peaceful relations between employer and employee. The workers in each industry will elect a commission of control comprising nine members, six to be chosen by the rank and file and three by the higher employees. The commission will delegate to each plant two or more workers to exercise control and furnish reports. The manufacturers in each branch of industry also will select commissions of nine for negotiations with the commissions set up by the employees. All controversies are to be settled, without appeal, by two arbiters chosen from either side, under the presidency of a third person selected by the workmen's delegates or nominated in case of disagreement, by the president of the tribunal.

Many points in this interesting experiment in industrial democracy on a nationwide scale remained in doubt, but the world will watch closely how it works out. Factory owners were bitterly opposed to the system proposed, and changes may be made in the measure before the Italian Parliament passes it.

Mr. Harding in Florida

PRESIDENT-ELECT HARDING has been enjoying a vacation in Florida waters aboard Senator Frelinghuysen's houseboat Victoria, and temporarily has dropped work on appointments and the determination of the program of his administration. Golf on courses along the coast furnished recreation, and he appeared bronzed and invigorated by the rest.

Seeing Jesus

A Sermon by Rev. EDMUND T. BYLES*

TEXT—John 20:20. "Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord."

THEY saw the Lord." That made all the difference. The wonderful story is that the first to whom Jesus revealed Himself after He arose was Mary Magdalene, out of whom He had cast seven devils. You remember the story. How that she was so blinded by tears when they could not find the body that she did not know Jesus when He stood before her. "She, supposing Him to be the gardener, saith unto Him, 'Sir, if thou hast borne Him hence, tell me where thou hast laid Him and I will take Him away.'" How Jesus spoke the one word, "Mary," in the voice she knew so well. How her whole soul responded in the one word, "Master," and how she flew to tell what she had seen to the rest of the little company with the one sentence on her lips: "I have seen the Lord." The broken-hearted mourner was changed in a single instant into the first glad missionary of the Gospel of a living Christ. And she was transformed by a sight of Jesus.

The change that took place in these ten men, gathered in the upper room, was exactly similar and has been often described. They, too, were fearful, despairing, broken-hearted. They, too, were transformed in a few short moments into men of gladness, courage, enthusiasm. And that which wrought the change in them too was a sight of Jesus.

IT IS possible in a very real sense to see Jesus in the twentieth century. And our first point is that we, too, need to see Jesus.

For there is empty religion when Jesus is not seen. Mrs. Stowe, in her wonderful book, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," says that St. Clare once asked his little daughter Eva: "What is being a Christian?" and she at once replied: "Loving Jesus Christ most of all." And she was right. But often that is not what men see when they talk about religion. Religion is to many a set of rules, laws—things they have to do. To many it is a series of restraints, binding them down, holding them in, making life hard and poor. And to many it is a series of religious duties, going to church, Bible reading, making prayers. So do many try to live out a dull, empty, legal, religious life, because they do not see that religion is Jesus. They do not see Him who said: "I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with Me."

There is doubt and fear because of not seeing Jesus. When Paul was being taken a prisoner to Rome, the Alexandrian ship in which they were voyaging was struck by a fearful tempest. For days they were driven on, a shipload of despairing men. Yet there was one man on board whom the tempest could not alarm, a center of cheer and encouragement, urging the rest to eat and to keep up their spirits. For beside Paul Jesus had stood, assuring him that he was safe in His keeping.

There is feebleness and helplessness among the followers of Jesus when they do not see Him. Not seeing Jesus is the reason why so much of our work for Him is ineffective. How can we "give our experience" when we have none to give? Our message must be personal testimony. It must be that of the ten when the next day they found the missing Thomas and said to him with their hearts full: "We have seen the Lord."

BUT can we see the Lord? The text is the exclamation of men who had seen Him in His actual bodily presence. Afterward "He ascended to Heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty." In what sense can we talk of "seeing Jesus"?

Apart from all debatable ground of visions and exceptional experiences in a very real sense it is the privilege of every Christian to "see Jesus."

We are very apt to see Him, if we are found in the company He keeps.

That first Sunday evening Thomas was away. How much he missed! But his friends did what it is to be wished all the disciples of Jesus would more often do. They went after him, and told him what a good service they had had and invited him to come to meeting next Lord's Day. They succeeded—as some of us might succeed if we would only try—and the next Sunday evening, Thomas was there with them, full of unbelief, almost scornfully incredulous, but there with them. And there, as so often since, in the midst of his followers, the presence of the Master was revealed. There doubting Thomas, too, saw the Lord. To him, as to the rest, there came the vision which made him ever after a changed man.

* Pastor First M. E. Church, Coxsackie, N. Y.

We may see Jesus in His word.

Exhortations are often made to Christians to read their Bibles, and we all have a dim idea that it is part of our Christian duty to offer a prayer, morning and night, and to open the book we call the Bible and read a few sentences.

But the reading of the Bible may be the dreariest occupation imaginable! It is sadly possible to read the Bible in the wrong way, as a kind of charm, as though the opening and the perusing so many lives of the printed page had in it some unfailing virtue.

IT IS not so. The Pharisees were great Bible students and Jesus told them that their Bible reading was no use. "Ye search the Scriptures," He said to them, "because ye think that in them ye have eternal life; and these are they that bear witness of Me; and ye will not come to Me that ye might have life." Their Bible reading was useless because they did not see Jesus there.

Read the Bible always with this end in view. It is best to read those parts most where He is most clearly revealed. It is a good plan for young Christians to begin their Bible study, not with Genesis and Exodus, but with Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. Four lovely portraits of Jesus drawn by different pens, that the picture may be more complete." And as we would greedily read a letter from a loved and absent friend, and, perhaps still more eagerly, the words of some one who had seen them lately and could tell us all about them, so let us read these memoirs of Jesus and we shall find them to be like the Garden of Eden where the Lord walked and where those who loved Him could meet Him face to face.

WE MAY see Jesus when we pray. Prayer is not begging gifts of God as a beggar solicits alms at our door. Jesus taught that we are not heard for our speaking. "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask Him." Prayer is bringing our needs and hopes and cares, but mainly ourselves, into His presence.

Jesus spent whole nights in prayer to God. Was He begging, beseeching, "wrestling" those long quiet hours? I can not think so. Surely He was refreshing and strengthening His soul by calm and trustful communion with His Father as upon some visit home you might commune with your loved mother. One of the most beautiful and helpful books it has ever been my joy to read is Henry Drummond's tiny volume on "The Changed Life." Speaking in it of prayer, he has this memorable sentence: "Ten minutes spent in His society every day, aye, two minutes if it is face to face and heart to heart, will make the whole day different." "If it be face to face and heart to heart."

There is the condition and the spirit of all true prayer. If you have asked how Christ may be seen in prayer, you have asked a question difficult to answer in words. But He has said: "He that loveth Me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love Him and will manifest Myself unto him." It is like the sunrise—perhaps the most wonderful sight in all God's wonderful creation. Before the sun itself is seen, the stars begin to fade and the sunlight to make itself felt. The sky gradually changes color, and all nature begins to be filled with golden glory. And all this before the sun itself is seen. So with the revelation of Jesus: "Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in His wings." Not until we reach our Father's house shall we see Him in His glory. Yet may all our earthly lives be glowing with the glory of His presence.

SEEING Jesus has two magnificent results. The first is joy. What is the greatest human joy? Beyond doubt, the joy of the presence of one we love. Wonderful and divine is the passionate joy of the mother, to whom the whole world is nothing if only you will leave her in peace beside the little cradle, and who, when the talk is of gems and treasures, brings forward, like the noble Roman matron, her boys, and says: "These are my jewels." There is no joy like the joy of love.

Lift this bliss to divine relationships, and you have the greatest joy Heaven knows. That joy came to those men when Jesus came. They went forth to face the world with their hearts full of Heaven. If you have not much happiness and a not very steady place in your Christian life, do not seek for happiness, do not seek for peace. Seek for Jesus, to see Him and to know Him. For when you find Him, you find "a peace that passes all understanding" and "a joy unspeakable and full of glory." "In Thy presence is fulness of joy; at Thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore."

The other result is transformation. As we saw at the first, these men were revolutionized. They were changed from cowards to heroes; from selfish men, constantly struggling to be first, to men to whom selfishness was almost unknown, ready to lay down their very lives. From men filled with dreams of material glory they became the leaders of the greatest movement for the spiritual uplift of man that the world has ever known. And it was all accomplished by the presence of Jesus.

So with us. If we would be like Jesus, we must live with Him. It is the only way. He trained His disciples by that three years' companionship—indeed that training of the Twelve was one of the most important aspects of His work—and by His spiritual presence with them and with His greatest apostle, Paul, He carried on the transformation through all after years. "We all, with unveiled face, reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory unto glory."

True Charity

TOO often the word "charity" seems to imply a giving of material substance by one blessed with an over abundance to one in less fortunate circumstances. It is true that such alms and gifts are generally the outward expression of the higher emotions of the soul, but we cannot all be public benefactors.

The charity which is denied to no one, the best charity I know, is that as set forth in the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians. It is the attitude with which one meets his fellow men, in whatever walk or phase of human experience, which tends to give the depressed a glimpse into the lasting joys of life and leads those who are laboring under the deception of evil forces to recognize eternal Truth. It is that culture of the mind which by contact reveals that there is a wealth of soul and a state of happiness that cannot be measured by any material standard.

The men and women whose lives are uplifting forces are the men and women with vision. They can look at nature and see more than existing forms of matter, they can find beauty intermingled with the most rugged and barren spots of landscape and they can look at the stars and feel themselves a part of a vast and harmonious whole. They stand serene, joyous in the knowledge of life. They freely give of the sunshine which they have stored up through long hours of silent thought and those in need cannot but recognize beauty and become recipients of that wealth that knows no measure. It is of such that the multi-millionaire has sought and received alms in a time when his soul craved that which gold could not buy.

Addison says, "Charity is a virtue of the heart and not of the hands." The life that uplifts the soul of humanity by its personal contact with men, silently sharing of its abundance of happiness and beauty, is the life that counts most in the molding of characters, in advancing communities and in shaping the destinies of nations.

The Daily Meditation

By Revs. J. H. Jowett, D.D., C. C. Albertson, E. W. Caswell and H. P. Hoskins

The Roaring Lion

SUNDAY. I Pet. 5:8. "Be sober, be watchful; your adversary the devil, as a lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour." The devil comes as a roaring lion. The subtlety of the serpent is laid aside; he discards the sheen of the angel of light; he appears as sheer brutal force, an antagonist of terrific and naked violence, bearing down his victims under the heavy paws of relentless persecution. When the apostle wrote this letter, the lion was about; Nero was at work; the Christians were being hunted to death, in the vain attempt at stamping out their faith and devotion to the Man of Nazareth, their Saviour and their Lord. He comes as a serpent, as an angel of light, as a roaring lion. He came to the Master as a serpent when he offered Him worldly power. He came as an angel of light when he sought to deepen and enrich His trust. He came to Him as a roaring lion in the blows and blasphemies of the bloodthirsty multitude.

This antagonism we have got to meet. How can we meet it in the hope of certain triumph?

"Be sober." The culture of sobriety! See to it that you are not intoxicated, drugged into any kind of perilous stupor. Keep your head clear. Be collected. "Be sober."

Now, the apostle is writing to men and women who are professedly the followers of Jesus Christ, and I think there are two perils in the religious life, both of which have their issue in moral stupor. We can lose our senses in excitement, and we can lose them in sleep. There are perils in sensationalism, and there are perils in encroaching drowsiness. There is the stupor which accompanies exaggeration, and there is the stupor of indifference. There is an excessive emotionalism which offers no barriers against the incursions of the devil.

That is the peril of all revivals. Men may "lose their heads," and their very excitement fosters a moral drowsiness which gives hospitality to the besetting forces of temptation and sin. It is among the highly emotional races that we find the profoundest moral sleep. "Be sober." If your spirit be fervent, at all pains let it be clear.

"Be watchful." Not only be sober, but thoroughly awake, exercising your perceptions to the rarest and most fruitful refinement. We know the large possibilities which allure us in the cultivation of the physical senses; equally large possibilities glow before us in the culture of the soul. Every exercise of watchfulness ensures us stronger sight. In the quest of the Divine we come to self-possession. In this line of culture the progress is from the greater to the less. The moral senses perceive ever finer and finer essences of good and evil.

Moral progress is in the direction of the scruple. The finest scholar in the school of Christ is he who has the rarest perception of the moral trifle. "He that doeth the least of these commandments is greatest in the kingdom of heaven." Therefore, exercise thy moral senses, lest the hordes of evil should enter through the gates of unperceived neglects. "Be watchful." J. H. J.

The Battle of Good Against Evil

MONDAY. Romans 17:21. "When I would do good, evil is present with me." It has been suggested that Paul's seventh chapter of Romans must have given Stevenson his story of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. Here good and evil are struggling for the supremacy in the same personality. Dr. Henry Jekyll was the better self, pure and noble in aspiration. Edward Hyde was the evil, sensual, cruel nature, attacking the angel spirit of lofty manhood. One day the power of personality could not change back from Hyde to Jekyll; evil habits had the will power by the throat, hurling the nobler self from the throne. It was then that Satan swayed his scepter over the soul.

Paul's cry of desperation, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death," was answered in the glorious words, "Through Jesus Christ our Lord!" There can be no doubt about the outcome of the battle of life, when our Lord's spirit of power fills the soul of the believer. The Conqueror of the ages will give you the victory over appetite, heredity and all the forces of evil.

It is a question of the mightiest import, Who shall rule in the citadel of the soul? The higher and lower natures bid for the possession of the immortal personality. Mr. Hyde, promising pleasure, position, gratification of passions and worldly wealth and power, is pulling hellward, while Dr. Jekyll, longing to be like the pattern of his Lord, listening to the voice of ministering angels and the call of loved ones, is battling with Apollyon for triumph. Man cannot serve two masters; he must decide. Christ demands all the heart's love and devotion.

May it not be that two desires shall fight for the mastery at one and the same moment? Men who know the right, and even love the right, may still do the wrong; but even the darkest heart has hopes of life everlasting. Paul won this victory when he came to himself, and saw his error and lost condition; when he cried, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" and realized the glorious fact that "It is not I that live, but Christ that liveth in me." The Man in the Wilderness

TUESDAY. Luke 3:2. "The Word of God came unto John, the son of Zacharias, in the wilderness." When we say the Word of God came to a man, we mean that God spoke to him, and that he became conscious of a communication from the Eternal. Was it a dream he had? Was it a vision he saw? Was it a voice he heard? We do not know; but whatever it was, it produced conviction and led to action. Hitherto he has been listening. Now he speaks. And he speaks with a new power, a power that shakes thrones. The voice is his own, but the message is from God. The true herald is content to be a voice. There is your true prophet—your true preacher—"Preach the preaching that I bid thee."

Let us not forget to whom the word of God came. To a man in the wilderness, a man very close to Nature. His senses were not dulled by familiarity with the strife of tongues, babel-sounds of the marketplace, or the martial music of the camp. He had sought solitude and loved it because it afforded him a chance to think, to pray. Do not imagine he had fled from the haunts of men to forget the needs of humanity. The wilderness was not to him an opiate. Study his sermon when he had a chance to preach to city folks. He had the social consciousness and the social conscience. He was as keen for justice as the modern poet who prayed:

"Open my heart to music; let Me thrill to Spring's first lutes and drums;
But never let me dare forget
The bitter ballad of the slums."

All the great religious leaders have had their illumination in places apart from intense activity. Moses was a keeper of sheep. David came to the throne of his power fresh from the hills. Paul had his preparation for apostleship in the desert of Arabia.

There must always be men of affairs as well as men of reflection. Now and then we find the combination in one man of both action and meditation. But not to the pushing, energetic promoter does God generally first speak. Rather to the dreamer, the mystic, the tiller of the soil, the gatherer of the fruit. Then through him God speaks to others. The reflective soul has his windows open towards heaven. He is a "watcher of the skies." He first sees the star because his eyes are on the sky. C. C. A.

The Struggle for the Heights

WEDNESDAY. Luke 15:18. "I will arise and go to my father." The mental anticipation always precedes the physical action. There are many decisive actions we have never taken, but should occasion arise, it is already decided what our action would be. We usually rehearse our decisions privately before we put them into action. In this great Bible classic, the "I will" comes before the "He arose."

Decisions are always made in the valley. If there were no valley there would be no aspiration for the heights. If we had been born on the heights and had stayed on the heights, no decisions would be necessary. But we were born in the valley, and many of us are content to remain as we were born. This is the infinite pathos of it. To be lost, a person needs to do nothing, no decision, no struggle, no toil is necessary. But to be saved, a person needs to do something very definite and resolute.

The first struggle is the inward one and this is the most important. "I will arise." The Bible lays great stress on the human will. "If any man will to do His will, he shall know the teaching." When the prodigal, whose name is Everyman, said: "I will arise," he expressed a desire to rise. There is hope for a man who decides to struggle for the heights. They stand for that which appeals to our desire for the best.

There is something about the heights that satisfies our sense of peace and security. They stand for the hills of God to which we lift up our eyes. They are the spiritual altitudes above the miasmas of this world; above its pride and greed and sensuality. When we struggle thus it shows that we have not succumbed to the valley. "Above the noise of selfish strife, we hear thy voice, O Son of Man."

God's Love for His Children

THURSDAY. Psa. 103:13. "Like as a father loveth his children, so the Lord loveth them that fear Him." Bishop Fowler once said in a sermon: "One of the happiest moments of my early manhood was when a lovely little girl came into our home. As she grew in beauty, I well remember the first time she went to sleep in my arms. As I held her, I was afraid I would hurt her or break her in my awkwardness. Yet I held her as gently as I could. I shall never forget how she rolled her head over against me, and, looking up into my face with a smile of security and confidence, dropped off to sleep. As I stood there, her trust in me made me happy. It would have taken a strong man to have harmed her, sleeping in that confidence."

How much more our heavenly Father longs to have us confidently trust Him, reposing in His everlasting arms, nestling in the bosom of His love, for "He giveth His beloved sleep," rest and protection.

Did not Jesus give the world foregleams of coming reunion beyond this life when He said to the widow's son, "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise," and He gave Him to his mother, or when He presented the restored daughter to Jairus, the father, or when He called forth Lazarus, to the presence of the sisters at Bethany? Are not these pictures of the reunion in the home of the eternal? A father or mother may forget their child, but God says, "I will not forget thee." The heavenly Father wants us more than we want Him. We may sink down into His arms with perfect confidence and love; He will hold us fast, so that no harm will come to us on ocean or on shore.

When Heart Should Speak to Heart

FRIDAY. I Sam'l. 23:16. "And Jonathan went to David in the wood and strengthened his hand in God." One of my heroic New Year resolutions is to take the false sentiment out of that much abused phrase: "Say it with flowers." Not that I do not love flowers or to give and receive them. Nor that flowers fail, on certain occasions, to express tender and noble sentiment. Like Mary's spikenard they do all of this. I would not discourage flowers at the last ministration to the dead. But not for worlds should we "say it with flowers," if we can say it in a better way.

Say it with earnest words and honest deeds and say it now. Flowers have their noble and beautiful uses both as tribute to the dead and the living, but do not make flowers say, to either the dead or the living, what you have neglected to say in personal appreciation. In other words, let there be no substitute for the sincere expressions of tender regard, due friend and loved one today and now. The pathos of the flowers is that they often come too late.

Flowers fade; but an honest confession of wrong done, of kindness unacknowledged, of debts of gratitude unpaid—these do not fade from the memory so quickly. H. P. H.

The New Commandment

SATURDAY. John, 13:35. "As I have loved you." The old commandment read: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," but as Jesus interpreted and illuminated the old by the Gospel view, He gave these words of the Eleventh Commandment, "Love one another as I have loved you." How much more glorious is His pattern. Contrast our own love of self and Christ's love towards us. What a chasm between these loves! It is a great step for us to do unto others as we would have them do unto us, but to give yourself for others as Jesus did—how Godlike is such love! This matchless love is still further explained by the words "Even as the Father hath loved Me, so I also have loved you." Here is love to the uttermost heights and depths of infinite being. Our love must be like His in kind, according to our capacity—love to the uttermost of ability. Earth and heaven are united by this bond of unity.

This is love that passeth knowledge. It lays hold of the human heart with the grip divine. "As He is, so are we in this world"; He is the love-gift of God to men. Like Him in love we may be. By this badge of love shall all men know that we are His disciples.

This holy tide of love, flowing over the earth, is to sweep away all jealousy, hatred, strife, opposition. Love is the garden where all graces grow, where souls are lifted up into blessed life, like seeds into flowers where the soil of self bursts into sacrificial service. Love and life are the two grandest glories in the universe of God! Love such as this Livingstone had for Africa, Duff for India, Morrison for China; like the love of Jesus for the people of all continents, kindreds and tongues throughout the world. E. W. C.

Weighing Political Candidates

A Suggestion for a Test to Determine Their Fitness for Office

By A. J. BISSINGER

IT CANNOT be doubted that the vast majority of American voters desire that the public offices should be filled by men of the very highest type of morality. Nor can it be doubted that there are more than enough men and women of this type to fill the political offices in the United States. But it is beyond dispute that the present-day political machinery is failing most of the time in placing such persons in office. Can it be true that politicians are moved more by feeling and self-interest than by facts and the general welfare? It is common knowledge that the natural sciences are based upon facts and principles. Some of the social sciences are also demanding facts for their foundations. But how about politics? If the political world is ever to come to its own it, too, must dispense with bias and partisan spirit, and build on facts and trustworthy principles.

In an effort to provide an aid or device for giving reliable information to the voters regarding the moral character and qualifications of aspirants for public honor, I submit a "Character Test for Political Candidates." This test idea is simply a call for facts and safe principles; it is not a call for a new political party or for any change in political machinery. Politics needs better men more than it needs better machinery. The test idea is not new; we simply ought to extend its use to the field of morals, administer it to politicians as well as to other professions, and do so courageously and impartially.

THE facts which should be sought, together with a brief explanation of the reason for asking such questions, are listed herewith under ten headings:

1. Biographical: Candidate's name, address, nationality? Chief facts about parents or guardians? Chief childhood and youthful experiences, places of abode, etc.? Political history?

As a rule voters have neither desire nor time to study the complete biography of a political candidate. However, voters usually want to know the high peaks of a candidate's life—whether his early training took place in the East, South, North or West; also the politics of his father, of his community, etc., and the candidate's own political history, whether consistent or uncertain.

2. Intellectual Life: Any interesting items about candidate's schooling, degrees, and honors? School studies or activities that held his greatest interest? Least interest? Grades, marks or standing in these studies from school records? Names of books (other than text-books) having marked influence upon him? Other intellectual occupations or activities? Rating of candidate's intelligence from standard mental tests?

This is mainly to learn the candidate's chief intellectual interests and abilities. That this helps to reveal character goes without saying. Furthermore, the demand for the rating of a candidate's intelligence by a standard mental test is not unreasonable. If the ranking of advanced army officers is determined by superior intelligence, why withhold the same tests from civil officers whose efficiency is equally dependent upon superior intelligence?

3. Personal, Moral and Social Qualities: Facts that indicate candidate's childhood and youthful initiative, leadership and executive ability? Incidents that reveal whether or not he is patient, tolerant, kind, courteous, accommodating, punctual, accurate, exact, neighborly, co-operative, consistent, changeable or steady of purpose? Use of tobacco, alcoholic drinks, vulgar language, past and present? Any other facts or incidents revealing candidate's personal qualities or moral characteristics, favorable or unfavorable?

Full and truthful answers to these questions ought to expose a large and legitimate area of a candidate's life. To be sure that a candidate has been and is now a real leader; that he is and always has been kind, punctual, co-operative and steady of purpose; that his language and personal habits are clean and pure, and that his associates are of a similar character—this is just what voters want to know, but are not always privileged to learn.

4. Domestic Life: Names, ages, occupations and location of candidate's family? Actions and methods that reveal candidate's interest in the physical, moral, intellectual and religious welfare of members of family? Names of all papers, magazines and journals taken in his home? Which of these is read most? Names of books, etc., candidate has read or is reading on child life and training, family interests, community welfare and kindred subjects?

We believe the questions on "domestic life" are not too inquisitive of the privacies of family relations. There are many domestic habits and practices that every right-minded home is willing the public may know. We believe the majority of voters in the United States do not care to have some partisan politician express his opinion that this or that candidate has a beautiful home life. The majority of voters want not opinion, but facts. Since it is universally conceded that the family is one of the most—if not the most—important social institutions, and since it is generally believed that one's conduct in one's own home reveals one's character more accurately than conduct outside the home, we feel sure every voter has a right to know the actual facts about a candidate's domestic conduct. Furthermore, a knowledge of the reading material of his home is not an unfair request. "Tell me what you read and I will tell you what you are" applies as much, if not more, to one who aspires to social and political leadership than to the one who votes for such leaders.

5. Recreational Life: Chief childhood and youthful sports, play and pastime? Present pleasures, recreation and pastime? Hobbies?

"What would you do if you were suddenly given a vacation day, and could do just as you pleased?" This is asked sometimes as a test question in morals. If a person could be free from looking after the needs and wishes of others, and were permitted to do just as one's own individual tastes and whims called for—how revealing of one's true self! Learning thus the facts about a candidate's recreations and hobbies, a voter is helped in making a truer estimate of his worth.

6. Financial Standing, Property Possessions: Name, location, approximate value and brief description of all the candidate's real estate and large property possessions? Approximate amount of all bank accounts, deposits, etc.? Any debts? Overchecking of accounts? Facts or incidents of candidate's financial honesty, dishonesty, profiteering, graft practices, pro or con?

WHEN the election returns are in, the average American citizen is all too prone to lose all interest in political affairs. Perhaps he is convinced the victors were not the men best fitted for office, but he gives no thought to such matters until the eve of another election. The time to mature political reforms is in the period while the mistakes of the last election are fresh in mind and before the bosses have made certain of the success of their slates. It is in line with that, that we present here Mr. Bissinger's "Character Test for Political Candidates," designed to afford a means of selecting better men for public office.

The Twentieth Century New Testament says: "The love of money is the root of all kinds of evil." Nobody doubts this. If a candidate actually loves money more than the highest welfare of human beings, and is elected—may he not be the cause, directly or indirectly, of "all kinds of evil"? This is in accord with Holy Writ and is true to observation. Some candidates love their wealth legitimately, but love humanity more. However, a voter wants considerable evidence before he believes it; he requires data on the candidate's financial status.

7. Church Life: Candidate's interest and attendance at church during childhood and youth? Name and location of church of which he is a member or attends at present? Names of churches attended by his family? Actual present church attendance of candidate and family? Facts of candidate's active participation in church work or other religious activities? Any other incidents that reveal candidate's interest in church life as an aid in character culture?

This is not a "religious" test, as such. Its aim is not to raise the question of Jew, Catholic or Protestant; to do so is un-American. A voter, if truly American, will make denominationalism a secondary matter. Doubtless, most voters prefer to have religious men and women as officers, provided their religion is wholesome individually, pure socially and edifying morally. This is about all many voters care to know about a candidate and this test is intended simply to measure a candidate's interest in the church as an institution that fosters the development of good character.

8. Recent Specialized Interests and Ambitions (as special preparation for office): Books, etc., read, visits or investigations made in activities and subjects allied to the work and duties of the office sought?

Truly, a candidate may have a satisfactory character, but a voter often asks whether he also has any special interest in the work his prospective office will demand. Is this special interest inherited, or has he acquired such interest by intensive study of books, surveys, investigations, etc.? What has the candidate ever done to convince the voter he has such special interest? We believe the voter has a right to know these facts also.

9. Political Views: What are candidate's political and partisan views, in plain and simple words, and written personally?

Although the emphasis of this test as a whole is upon character, yet a statement of the candidate's political views seems quite in order, provided it is brief and in simple language and written by the candidate himself.

10. Political Promises: A. General: 1. I promise, if elected, to allow political attitudes and partisan bias to have a secondary place in the determination of my position on public issues and problems, and to permit ethical principles and high moral standards to have primary place in the determination or solution of public issues, using the ethical teachings of the New Testament as chief guide and authority. 2. I promise, if elected, to extend only a kind and courteous treatment to any and all political opponents and partisans, and upon occasion express it both in words and deeds; furthermore I shall endeavor to induce other political candidates and officers to do likewise. 3. I promise, if elected, to give reasonably quick and definite responses to inquiries from my constituency concerning any political or moral action taken or to be taken when in office. 4. I promise, if elected, to consider any attempt by any person, company or corporation to buy my vote or influence me in any way contrary to justice and integrity. I promise to consider such attempt just reason to cast my vote and influence contrary to the wish of such person or company. B. Specific: I promise, if elected, to vote for (or against) (1) child welfare measures, (2) more school taxes, (3) "bone dry" measures, (4) industrial arbitration, (5) League of Nations Covenant, etc.

These promises, as given in the test, are self-explanatory. A person of character ought to be willing to sign his name to all of them. Some office-seekers may offer to make further promises; some may prefer not to make any. We can easily guess which candidate a voter would choose if one would sign his name to all of them and another would refuse to sign any. Since none of us prefer to have our office-holders use the teachings of Mohammed or Confucius or Buddha in determining political policies, we believe it is perfectly reasonable to ask them to use the ethical teachings of Jesus, as found in the New Testament, as their "chief moral guide and authority." "The general" promises indicated in the test might be suitable for any office and for all time. The "specific" promises, however, would change as time changes and as new problems arise.

HOW could such a test be put into use? We believe that if character tests ever come into usefulness, their rise into such usefulness will probably take the course that Prohibition took—namely the "local option" route. There are always a few counties in every State that are progressive in moral welfare, and have a broad-minded, non-partisan editor as one of their leaders. With some volunteer assistance to begin with, such an editor could easily gather at least the most important information called for in the test, and could continue to do so for all candidates in the county who seek either local, State or Federal office. If the tests prove successful in securing the facts which the people need in order to vote judiciously and wisely, its use would naturally spread to other counties, thus following the "local option" course in its development.

Another plan for administering tests might be as follows: Every county has several trustworthy, retired citizens of the leading political parties. One of each of these parties could be selected by the local party organization and all work together, gathering information about all candidates of all parties, as called for in the test or as local circumstances demanded. One person from each political party, and all working together, would tend to make them eliminate unreliable, biased information, and furnish only facts, incidents and actual happenings and occurrences about every candidate. Doubtless, with society's continual demand for good character, many office-seekers with doubtful morals would never run for such positions. Men whose lives could stand such a test with fair showing could have much of the demanded information ready for disposal when the test-administrators came around.

Upon election day each voter could deposit a small contribution at his voting place or elsewhere, which could be given to these men for their service. If twenty-five cents were contributed by each of 15,000 voters in an average sized county, the combined salary of two such test administrators would be $3750, or $1875 for each man. And what serious-minded voter would be unwilling to give twenty-five cents for the very facts he wants to know? Certainly with experience better methods of managing the gathering of facts would be found and developed.

Famine sufferers, dependent on America's generosity; receiving provisions at a relief station

Feeding China for Five Months

GENEROUS readers of the Christian Herald can have the satisfaction of knowing that up to January 22 they had been instrumental in preserving for a period of one month the lives of 355,000 victims of starvation in the five northern provinces of China.

An additional $100,000 was handed to the American Committee on January 22 for transmission to China, bringing the total actually sent to the relief of the sufferers by the readers of the Christian Herald up to that date to $355,000. Knowing that one dollar is sufficient to purchase food for a Chinese for one month, readers can visualize for themselves the tangible results of their generosity.

Latest reports from China indicate that at the most conservative estimate 11,000,000 people in the northern provinces are literally starving. They have no prospect of preserving life save through outside help, and that help must flow freely to them for a period of five months from the first of January, that is, until the beginning of next June, when it is hoped that the new harvest may be ready.

In our issue of February 5 we announced contributions received up to January 19 as $354,959.49. The daily record for the week following was as follows:

January 20	$13,673.83
" 21	4,546.75
" 22	3,303.78
" 24	7,855.27
" 25	3,718.76
" 26	6,969.02

Grand Total $395,026.90

MR. THOMAS W. LAMONT, chairman of the nation-wide China Famine Committee appointed by President Wilson, has sent to Mr. Graham Patterson, publisher of the Christian Herald and Vice-Chairman of the Executive Committee, the following letter of thanks for the readers of this magazine for their contributions forwarded to the famine victims in China.

"My dear Mr. Patterson:

"I thank you kindly for your letter of January 4th and the check representing the contributions to the China Relief from Christian Herald readers. It is certainly a remarkable showing and gives our Committee great encouragement in looking toward the future.

"The organization of our campaign is steadily progressing, and with the co-operation of all is, I am sure, bound to raise a large sum for the help of the Chinese famine sufferers.

Supplies from Manchuria Now Are Reaching the Stricken Provinces

"Please let me congratulate you upon the work that you and your organization have so ably done, the benefits of which are sure to be increasingly evident from day to day.

(signed) "T. W. Lamont"

IT CANNOT be overemphasized that the prime and immediate need in organizing the relief work is money. Food can be bought in sufficient quantities in Manchuria to feed the starving population of the famine provinces, and adequate arrangements have been made for its transportation. Two lines of railroad, one on the east and another on the west, run north and south through the famine area. Supplies are shipped to strategic points along these two lines, and thence are taken by mule carts and the great Chinese wheelbarrows, that can carry almost as heavy a load as a mule can drag to distribution points. The work of distribution is superintended by missionaries of all denominations, who have flocked to the famine area from all parts of China, freely volunteering their services. Food, principally beans, also comes by ship to the port of Chefoo, on the coast of Shantung, and is distributed thence by mule carts and wheelbarrows.

In view of these circumstances, the American Committee for China Famine Fund, which has coordinated all relief agencies, has decided after the most careful consideration to decline the numerous generous offers of contributions of corn which have been received. In explaining to would-be donors the reasons which have prompted this decision, the Committee made the following statement:

"Experts in both grain and transportation problems were called into extensive conference, and on their advice it finally has been decided necessary to announce definitely that no corn will be shipped from this country. The reasons are twofold:

"First. The difficulty of shipment for such a long distance and the probability that the cargo would heat before its arrival in the Orient. The authorities declare definitely that the grain would have to be kiln-dried before shipment, thus adding materially to the cost.

"Second. The fact that in the most favorable possible circumstances it would cost fifty cents a bushel to deliver corn in a Chinese port.

"The American dollar is (today) worth $1.60 in China. Our Committee in Peking finds it can buy food in the Orient for almost immediate delivery and it is the conviction of the American Committee that money and immediate food delivery is the all-important thing."

THE judgment of the American Committee is confirmed by Bishop W. R. Lambuth, of the Methodist Episcopal Church (South), who has recently returned from an extended tour of the famine-stricken provinces. "The need is more money," Bishop Lambuth declared emphatically in an address before the Foreign Missions Conference at Garden City. "If we had the money we could take care of these people. We could buy foodstuff, and we could have it transported by cart, muleback, or railroad."

Conditions as he found them, he declared, "almost baffle description." He told how he lay awake all one night in Tientsin; unable to sleep for the cries and groans of the 25,000 starving refugees from the famine area who were lying stretched along the stone pavements; he told how one thousand refugees fleeing from the terror to the northern side of the Great Wall, had perished of cold in a single night at Kalgan; he described a fierce battle he had witnessed between two starving women who spied at the same moment a half-eaten sandwich thrown from the window of a passing train; he told of naturally honest villagers roaming the country in search of work, and finally taking to pillage and robbery in sheer desperation.

Perhaps the most pitiable part of the Bishop's story came when he took his hearers with him to a once prosperous village, where he found not a baby under one year of age.

"I asked: 'Where are the children?'

"'Gone,' was the reply.

"'Given them away?' I queried.

"The reply came back: 'We have no one to give them to. Who can feed them? We have no one to sell them to. Who would buy them?' Why, children are being bought in Shanghai at a dollar apiece. The mother continued: 'Rather than see our children starve we will throw them into the wells.'

The Bishop's final word was: "You can have absolute confidence in the committees at work, because they have for their larger membership missionaries in each case, whether it be in Shanghai, Tientsin or Peking. Money sent and distributed through the committees which have been mentioned will surely reach its objective."

Wise and Foolish Virgins

International Sunday-School Lesson for February 20

By LUTHER DENNY WHITTEMORE, Litt. D.

LIKE all of the other parables of Jesus, the story of the wise and the foolish virgins is full of interest and suggestion, even when it is considered apart from its immediate connection with the culminating scenes in the Gospel narrative. It shows how strength and weakness of character are revealed in conduct; and although social institutions may change with successive generations, and customs vary in different localities, human nature is the same in all times and places, for no one can read the parable thoughtfully without feeling that the lesson which it contains is as appropriate today as it was when the words were spoken by the Master to His first disciples.

"The story itself," says Dr. William R. Taylor, "is so perfect in its simplicity that nothing is needed to aid us in its comprehension. . . . It is so realistic in its detail as to give an accurate description of an Eastern marriage procession, and it may well enough have been founded on some actual history. But what can equal the grouping of the various figures; the stirring suddenness of the midnight cry; the haste of the surprised sleepers; and the sadness of the disappointed ones as they cry with piercing earnestness, 'Lord, Lord, open to us!'"

"Even as a work of art, this parable is faultless as its author; and though there were no spiritual meaning beneath it, we could not but be impressed with its simple naturalness, its rapid movement, its tragic pathos, and its silent close as the midnight gloom folds in upon and hides the sadness of those who are shut out. When, however, we go deeper into it, and discern its spiritual significance, we find ourselves concerned; and we have no time for admiring the beauties of the parable, because of the pressing and personal importance of the truths which it suggests."

for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in." Definitely and finally rejected by the leaders of the nation, the Master henceforth turned His thoughts towards the preparation of His disciples, so far as He could prepare them, for the approaching end.

Many have been perplexed regarding the precise meaning of the symbolic language which Jesus used in answering the questions of the disciples; but whatever uncertainty our minds may feel, enough has surely been revealed to make plain our path of duty. If more specific instruction had been essential, we may be sure that it would not have been withheld.

First, it appears that the "day and the hour" of which Jesus spoke was not necessarily the end of the physical earth, for "this generation," He said, "shall not pass away till all these things be accomplished." Neither did He declare that His coming would be a spectacular event outwardly visible; for, although the early disciples at first expected Him thus to return, their expectation was not fulfilled, and they were compelled to readjust their attitude.

The event which must have been uppermost in the mind of Jesus and that for which He wished His disciples to watch and to be prepared, was the approaching crucifixion, which He had previously foretold. From the Christian point of view, this was the pivotal event in all history, bringing to Jesus and His disciples the end of the age then present and the beginning of a new dispensation in which His spirit rather than His body was to be manifested among men. The resurrection, also, was to be another significant manifestation of His presence, as well as the coming of the Holy Spirit; and as we now believe, Jesus has manifested Himself in all the ages.

THE figure of a marriage feast is frequently used to represent something exceedingly desirable. Here it is a symbol representing the kingdom of heaven, which elsewhere Jesus compared to a hidden treasure or a priceless pearl. The parable of the ten virgins gives assurance of the coming of the kingdom, however it may be retarded, and sets forth the need of constancy of endeavor in order that would-be citizens may attain the promised blessings. The ten maidens chosen to carry lamps or torches in the bridal procession were expecting to occupy places of honor, and all had accepted the responsibility implied in such a service. There is no suggestion of a willful violation of the obligation which had been assumed. The fault of the foolish was that of negligence rather than lack of appreciation of their opportunity. By forethought or thoughtlessness the individuals classified themselves as wise or foolish and received their reward or paid the penalty accordingly.

The parable, of course, should be studied in its connection in order that its intended application may be discovered; for Jesus employed it with a definite purpose, to answer the question of the disciples, "When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of Thy coming and of the end of the world?"

The final break had come between Jesus and His adversaries. The disputations in the temple had ended with the silencing of the Pharisees and the terrible denunciations which Jesus had pronounced upon them in the hearing of the disciples and the multitude. It seems almost incredible that He who had given the gracious invitation, "Come unto me," could also have spoken those severe words of condemnation: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men:

IN THE minds of many the present is in a peculiar sense a period of transition from one epoch to another. Old things seem to be passing away to make room for the new. By the great conflict and upheaval which recent years have witnessed, mighty forces have been released for working out the purposes of God. At such a time the Christian Church, as the representative of the kingdom of heaven on earth, has a responsibility and an opportunity never before equaled. Its mission is to spiritualize events by steadfast loyalty to the Master and by obedience to His commands.

However difficult it may be—and the difficulty may frankly be acknowledged—to interpret and apply the predictions of Jesus concerning the end of all things, the application of the essential teaching of the parable of the wise and the foolish virgins is comparatively simple. Whether Christ comes once for all at the end of the world, or to each individual at the end of his earthly life, or repeatedly in the crisis of the present and earthly life, there is always the same need of watchfulness.

The life of every individual is a never-ending series of emergencies and opportunities which can not be met successfully without due preparation. Achievement in matters great and small does not come by accident, but by thoughtful planning. Particularly is youth the appointed season of preparation for the crises which are sure to come both in the experience of the individual and in society.

The teaching of the parable of the wise and the foolish virgins is paralleled in many other Scripture passages; but perhaps the most comprehensive summary is that in the second chapter of Romans: "Who will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life."

HOW CHOOSING THE RIGHT WOOD MAY DOUBLE THE SERVICE YOU GET FROM LUMBER

"I cannot conceive at this time of a greater service to more people than to put order and system into the marketing of lumber."

This was said recently by one of the great industrial men of America.

He spoke as a buyer and user of lumber—thinking of the needs of industrial America, the big construction plans and the great era of home-building ahead; of the fact that every building project involves the use of lumber wholly or in part; and that the question touches every farm, every business, every town and city in the land.

Wood is the natural building material of America, just as stone is of France and Italy.

It is a startling fact that the service value of the average purchase of lumber could be increased 100%, if the buyer chose the most practical wood for a given purpose.

Putting order and system into the lumber business means wood in its right place.

It means selecting the kind of wood best suited for a given use.

It means specifying the grade best adapted for the job.

As substantial factors in the lumber business the Weyerhaeuser people wish to render real service to you and to everyone who uses lumber.

To this end we will supply to lumber dealers and to the public any desired information as to the qualities of different species and the best wood for a given purpose.

This service will be as broad and impartial as we know how to make it. We are not partisans of any particular species of wood. We advise the best lumber for the purpose, whether it is a kind we handle or not.

What we advocate is conservation and economy through the use of the right wood in its proper place.

If we could insure your getting the wood you ought to have, it might mean a difference of years in the life and service of the lumber—fifty years perhaps as against a few months. So important is the selection of the right wood or grade of wood for a given use.

From now on the Weyerhaeuser Forest Products trade-mark will be plainly stamped on their product. You can see it for yourself at the lumber yard or on the job after it is delivered.

When you buy lumber for any purpose, no matter how much or how little, you can look at the mark and know that you are getting a standard article of known merit.

Saving Steps in the Kitchen

A WOMAN may travel many useless miles within the limits of her own kitchen just because she neglects the simple rule of keeping near each other things that are to be used together. In arranging the pots and pans and other utensils, there is no excuse for having them put away just anywhere without any relation to their use. Those that are used oftenest should be in the most convenient places.

All the utensils might be divided into four groups—one group arranged to hang near the table, another on a shelf over the sink, another near the sink, and one near the stove. In the group near the table should be baking dishes, bowls, knives, bread, meat and vegetable-cutters, egg-beater, flour-sifter, forks, measuring-cup, molding-board, rolling-pin, spice-containers, strainers, and wooden spoons.

Over the sink might be placed the tea and coffee canisters, tea and coffee pots, double boiler, pitchers, saucepans, and collander. In the group near the sink would belong brushes, dish-pan, dish-drainer, dish-mop, funnel, scrapers, soapdish and soap-shaker, and in the group near the stove would be found together a box for new matches and a box for used matches, pot covers, toaster, frying-pan, and flour, pepper and salt dredges.

The Children's Lunch-Box

ONE problem confronting the busy mother is what to put into the children's lunch-box, when it is necessary that they carry the mid-day meal with them to school. For the sake of the child's health these luncheons should be carefully prepared, no matter how simple they must of necessity be. Just wrapping up "anything" that happens to be left over is not the proper way to treat the small members of the family dependent on a cold lunch at noon. Even when it is carefully prepared there is danger that it will grow monotonous if it is not planned for, as the home meals are.

A good luncheon plan is to provide a three-part menu—such as a substantial filling sandwich, a sweet, and a fruit. The fillings of the sandwiches can be varied each day to provide something different. Peanut butter is an excellent standby, and jelly, chopped hard-boiled eggs, sardines, pimento and cheese, cold meat, ham hash, cottage cheese and lettuce furnish a change for every day in the week for the substantial portion of the lunch-box meal. Then raisin bread, graham bread and brown bread, cut thin and buttered, make another variation that children like occasionally. Little paper cups can be filled with cup custards, meat jelly, macaroni and tomato or cheese, but these are a little more complicated and might be used only once in a while as a substitute for the sandwich. The children are sure to like them.

Molasses gingerbread always satisfies the craving for sweets, and raisin cake is another good dessert for the lunch-box. Among the best fruits are figs, dates, oranges, apples and bananas. When these fruits are expensive or out of season the sandwiches should be filled, if possible, with jelly or jam.

Simple lunch menus for a week could be arranged as follows:

1. Corn bread, well buttered, cup custard, apples.
2. Nut and cheese sandwiches, orange, gingerbread.
3. Hard-boiled egg, potato salad, peanut butter sandwiches.
4. Jam sandwiches, orange, graham crackers.
5. Cold roastbeef sandwiches, bananas, raisin cake.

Keeping the Kitchen Sink Clean

ONE of the most essential things in keeping the kitchen immaculate is that the sink should always be kept clean. This may be done easily by cutting or tearing up boxes such as those used for cereals, sugar, etc., into cards about three or four inches square and keep them in a box or drawer handy to the sink. After washing the dishes, scrape to one end of the sink with water the bits of garbage, etc., and scrape from one card on to another, throwing all together into the fire. In this way the many boxes that come into the house are utilized and the sink is kept clean without having a dirty, greasy scraper or brush always about.

Salt and Its Uses

ONE grows so accustomed to having salt always in evidence in the kitchen that little thought is given to its usefulness outside of the realm of cooking. It has various uses, however, that should not be overlooked in spite of its importance in keeping food from being tasteless.

For instance a little salt rubbed on the cups will take off tea stains, and if put into whitewash it will make it stick better. As a tooth powder it will keep the teeth white and the gums hard and rosy. If salt and water are used to clean willow furniture, apply it with a brush and rub it dry and the results will be most satisfactory. Salt and water held in the mouth after having a tooth pulled will assist in stopping the bleeding. Prints rinsed with it in the water will hold the color and look brighter.

Silk handkerchiefs and ribbons should be washed in salt and water and ironed wet to obtain the best results. As a fertilizer salt is very valuable. Thoroughly wetting the hair once or twice with a solution of salt and water will keep it from falling out.

Recipes Worth Trying

VIRGINIA BAKED HAM

WASH the ham and place in a boiler and cover with plenty of cold water. Bring slowly to a boil and then move to the simmering burner and cook for three and one-half hours. Let the ham stay in the water over night. In the morning lift out, place in a baking-pan and remove the skin and trim to shape. Let stand while preparing this mixture: One cupful of brown sugar, three tablespoonfuls of flour, two tea-spoonfuls of cinnamon, one teaspoonful of nutmeg, one teaspoonful of ginger, and one teaspoonful of allspice. Mix well by rubbing with the fingers and then put the mixture into the fat part of the ham. Place in a moderate oven, and baste every ten minutes with two-thirds of a cupful of cider vinegar. Bake for an hour, then remove from the oven and let cool. The top may be studded with whole cloves, to add a decorative touch.

BEET SALAD

Boil medium-sized beets until tender. Pare and scoop out the center. Grind the part scooped out with a little raw cabbage, onion, celery-stalks and a hard-boiled egg. Season with salt, pepper and vinegar. Fill the empty beet shell with the mixture and place each one on a lettuce leaf.

STUFFED STEAK

Have the butcher split a flank steak, leaving one side intact. Cook one-half package of macaroni in boiling salted water until tender. Drain and rinse with cold water. Chop one small onion, one stalk of celery, one green pepper and fry for five minutes in two tablespoonfuls of butter substitute. Add a can of tomatoes, salt and pepper and cook until the mixture thickens, then pour over the macaroni. Stuff the steak with the mixture and sew the sides together, place in a baking pan and sear in a hot oven; add one cupful of water and bake one hour in a slow oven.

CANNED PEAR DESSERT

Cook one-half cupful of well-washed rice for twenty minutes in plenty of salted boiling water. Drain and put in a double boiler with half a cupful of rich milk. Cook until the rice is soft and the milk absorbed. Flavor with a few drops of vanilla. Turn into a mold to cool.

Drain the pears free from the juice. Turn the rice out of the mold on a platter, arrange the pears about it and serve with whipped cream.

FISH FRICASSEE

Pick from the bones of cold boiled fish enough meat to make two cupfuls. Season with salt, pepper and a little cayenne, and fry lightly in a tablespoonful of butter substitute. Add one cupful of boiled rice and the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs mashed. Stir well and place on a platter and garnish with the whites of the eggs and pickles chopped together.

COFFEE-CAKE

The sponge is made with one cupful of lukewarm water, one teaspoonful of sugar, one pinch of salt, two cupfuls of flour and half a yeast cake. For the dough take one tablespoonful of butter, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, two eggs, half a teaspoonful of salt, half a cupful of lukewarm water, three to four cupfuls of flour to make soft dough. Make a sponge of the sponge materials and let the mixture stand over night. Then add the dough materials and make a soft dough. Let rise till light. Bake about twenty-five minutes in a moderate oven, after covering top with melted butter and sprinkling with cinnamon and sugar.

Slip-Covers for Furniture

THIS is the time of year to make the slip-covers that you intend to use for your furniture when the summer comes. They must be fitted carefully, and it takes time and patience to fashion them correctly, which is the reason that the making of them should not be put off until just before they are needed. A piece of material is pinned on the chair, and after being fitted it is cut the shape desired, leaving plenty of allowance for seams. The whole chair should be done this way and the various pieces sewed together as they are cut, with careful fitting each time a section is added. It is especially necessary to give looseness in a slip-cover. There must be plenty of give to it, so there will be no danger of splitting when it is sat upon.

For a stuffed chair, the strip that runs from the extreme top of the chair-back down to the seat, across the seat, and on down to the required length, should be cut lengthwise of the goods without any piecing. Before cutting, it should be tucked well into the crease between the seat and the back. The narrow fronts of the arms are cut separately. The arm's inner side is cut lengthwise and extends over the roll, under which another seam comes. The outside of the arm is cut in one with the side of the seat. The back of the chair is cut in two lengthwise pieces with the opening up the middle. The fasteners are balls and sockets, or buttons and button-holes.

In all slip-covers seams may be bound with tape of a harmonizing color.

Rag Rugs Again Popular

IT-OR-MISS patterned-rag rugs are very attractive, but those of only one color, well blended, seem to be the favorites in this revival of the floor covering that was so popular in the days of our grandmothers. If the rags are used before they are woven—some one or for the body of the rug, and another shade for the border, the very best results will be obtained.

Remember that in dyeing rags, in order to have any success, they must be free from all dirt. Boil them thoroughly and then rinse them several times in clear, cold water.

Another way to dye rag rugs is to have them woven just as they are, after being thoroughly cleaned. Then dip them into a dye of some neutral color—olive, green, gray, or some shade of tan or brown.

Helps for the Housewife

CLEAN fur: Wash and thoroughly dry a hair-brush with firm bristles. Cover the bristles with absorbent cotton. Brush the fur gently, firmly, always going the same way as the fur lies. When the cotton comes soiled change it. When finished shake the fur well to make it stand again.

small-sized baking-powder tin with holes pierced in the top will make a useful clothes sprinkler.

substitute two tablespoonfuls of corn-cake for an egg in a plain sugar cake. The only difference noticeable in the cake is that it will not keep moist so long.

pieces of bread that are to be used for sing will grind much more easily if they are thoroughly dried or toasted in an oven first.

white darning-cotton is better than red for darning lace curtains, as the cotton sinks into the fabric and is not noticed.

all buttons can be sewed on evenly by measuring the space by the lines on the paper. Make pencil dots at the ends of the lines on the cloth. The buttons may be grouped by skipping a certain number of lines.

Keep a supply of cinnamon sugar on hand in a jar. Then cinnamon toast may be quickly made.

In frying cooked corn-meal, add a little flour to hold the meal together, and a little sugar to make the mush brown more quickly.

After parsnips are boiled, if they are plunged into cold water, the skins will slip off easily.

A cheesecloth bag is excellent for draining lettuce and salad greens.

A fine E violin string is most satisfactory to string beads on if a fish cord is not at hand.

Don't patch blankets, but darn them with soft wool and a large-eyed needle.

All game should be soaked in salt water over night before cooking.

If you wish your bread to have a crisp crust, do not cover the bread when you take it from the oven.

Measure molasses in a greased cup and you will get every bit of it when turning it out.

diagnosis," he told them simply. "It's an extraordinary case, they say; but a not incurable one. The shock—when Jim kicked her—was a blessing in disguise. Not, of course, that I'd prescribe kicks for crippled children! But—" the term that he used was long and technical—"but such things have happened. Not often, of course. The doctors agree with me that, if her voice comes back—as I believe it will—there may be a very real hope for her hearing. And her eyes," his voice was suddenly tender, "well—thousands of slum kiddies are blind—and thousands of them have been cured. If Lily is, some day, a normal child—if she can some day speak and see, and hear, it will be—"

THE Superintendent's voice was soft as she interrupted.

"It is already a miracle!" she said simply. "It is already a miracle. Look at Jim—working for a small salary, and liking it! Look at Bennie—he was the head of his class in school, this month, he told me. And Ella—"

The Young Doctor interrupted. "Ella and her mother went to church with us last Sunday," he said. "Rose-Marie and I were starting out, together, and they asked if they might go along. I tell you—" his eyes were looking deep, deep, into the eyes of Rose-Marie and he spoke directly to her, "I tell you, dear, I've learned a great many lessons in the last few weeks! Jim isn't the only one—or Bennie. Lily isn't the only nearly incurable case that has found new strength."

Rose-Marie was blushing. The Superintendent, watching the waves of color sweep over her face, spoke suddenly—reminiscently.

"Child," she said—and laughter, tremulous laughter, was in her voice, "your face is ever so pink! I believe," she was quoting, "that you have a best bear!"

The Young Doctor was laughing, too. Strangely enough his laughter had just the suggestion of a tremor in it.

"I'll say that she has!" he said, and his words, though slangy, were very tender. "I'll say that she has!" And then—"Are we going back to the little town, Rose-Marie," he questioned. "Are we going back to the little town to be married?"

The blush had died from Rose-Marie's cheeks leaving them just faintly colored. The eyes that she raised to the Young Doctor's face were like warm stars.

"No," she told him, "we're not! I've thought it all out. We're going to be married here—in the Settlement House. I'll write my aunts to come on—and for my old pastor! I couldn't be married without my aunts . . . And my pastor; he christened me, and he welcomed me into the church, and—" all at once she started up from the table, "I'm going to the living-room to write, now," she managed. "I want to tell them that we're going to start our home here—" her voice broke, "here, on our own Island . . ." Like a flash she was out of the door.

The Young Doctor was on his feet. Luncheon was quite forgotten.

"I think," he said, and his face was like a light, "I think that I'll go with her—and help her with the letter!" The door closed, sharply, upon his hurrying back.

THE Superintendent, left alone at the table, rang for the maid. Her voice was carefully calm as she ordered the evening meal. But her eyes were just a bit misty as she looked into the maid's dull face.

"Mrs. Volsky," she said suddenly, "love must have its way! And love is—"

The maid looked at her blankly. Obviously she did not understand. But one, seeing her neat apron, her clean hands, her carefully combed hair, forgave her the vague expression.

"What say?" she questioned.

The Superintendent laughed wearily. "Any way," she remarked, "Ella likes her work, doesn't she? And Jim? And Bennie is going to be a great man—some day, isn't he? And Lily may be made well—quite well! You should be a glad woman, Mrs. Volsky!"

Pride flamed up, suddenly, in the maid's face—blotting out the dullness.

"God," she said simply and—marvel of marvels her usually toneless voice was athrob with love—"God is good!" She went out with a trayful of dishes.

Her chin in the palm of her hand, the Superintendent stared off into space. If she was thinking of a little blond child—lying in a hospital bed—if she was thinking of a man with sleek hair, trying to make a new start—if she was thinking of a girl with dark, flashing eyes and a small grubby-fingered boy, her expression did not mirror her thought. Only once she spoke as she was folding her napkin. And then—

"They're both very young," she murmured, a shade wistfully. Perhaps she was remembering the springtime of her own youth.

THE END

rest of the block is covered with semi-human masks and hieroglyphic panels. The frog was especially important as a totem, for the rain-god is always pictured with frog legs, and August, the height of the rainy season, was called the month of the frog. Whether the frog and the rain-god were the especial gods who favored the official acts of the women rulers who are seated within the mouth and on the body is one of the many unsolved questions of Mayan archaeology.

The "Turtle," in whose wide open mouth is seen the figure of another young woman holding the wand of office, is the finest piece of carving found in pre-historic America. It is the size of a small room eight feet high. Deep cartouches, resembling shields or ornaments with weird faces, make the relief, in places, a foot deep. Human hands, bony skeleton fingers and animal claws are wound together in the intricate scrolls which cover every inch of surface. The human appeal is insistent in Mayan sculpture, which is always heightened by contrasts with the semi-human deities.

"The leaning Stela" is another curiosity remaining from the Golden Age of the Mayans. Though it is thirteen feet out of the perpendicular, it seems, like the leaning tower of Pisa, as firm as any of the great monuments. However, there is always some apprehension about passing beneath this tipsy ruler, for the monument measures twenty-six feet above the ground, and one always has a suspicion that he might continue his downward course just at that particular moment. The popular theory for his reeling angle is that one of the frequent earthquakes of the country shifted the lower strata of sand in which the base was embedded. As a woman, I am glad that this falling monument represents a man and therefore can not be cited as the decline of woman's suffrage in the land of the Mayans.

Some day, it is to be hoped, that it will be possible to read the romance of these monuments. At present, however, they constitute a mystery, and act as a veil through which we peer at one of the most interesting stages of American civilization.

Chinese Converts Baptized

MISSIONARY Z. CHARLES BEALS of Bethel Station, Hockchow, Anhwei, via Nanking, China (Baptist), reports that his mission has received and baptized 51 converts during the year thus far. The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE Bowery Mission at the present time is the center of a great prayer movement. The most important subject that can occupy the mind of man at the present time is prayer, because it means the realization of the presence and power of God in our lives." This is from a letter by Rev. Dr. Halliward, Superintendent of the Mission, and one of the founders of the Prayer League, whose membership and activities have been greatly multiplied in recent years.

Evangelist J. Gordon McPherson writes to the Prayer League: "I am now engaged in a series of evangelistic meetings and Bible conferences, and need the endowment of more spiritual power, and I plead with you to read Acts 4: 29-30, also Ephesians 6: 18-20, and offer Scriptural prayers for me that, in these perilous times, I may render a greater service to the glory of our blessed Christ Jesus in leading precious lost souls to our Lord and Master, and the sick and afflicted souls may be healed by the laying on of hands and the prayer of faith."

"I desire to become a member of the League," writes J. W. Warren, Dallas, Texas, "and I desire all the pastors and churches under my supervision to seek for the higher life. I solicit the prayers of all members of the League, that all we ask might be granted through Jesus Christ, our Lord."

Mrs. L. M. writes: "Again I wish to ask prayers for a revival in this little city of Columbiana, Ohio."

Rev. H. M. Buck writes: "It gives me pleasure to unite with the Prayer League in daily prayer. We are in the midst of evangelistic meetings in our church here at Enola, Pa. Several of us feel the burden of unsaved souls about us, and we know the value of prayer. We believe our prayers are being heard and will be answered. Still we desire your prayers, that we may be a power for God. Especially do I ask prayers that I may be led by the Spirit aright, as a pastor, to preach the full message of the Gospel, and to be instrumental in leading many souls to Christ."

Mrs. L. B. J., Union, N. Y., writes: "We are in the midst of a campaign in this village. I wish to ask the League to join me in prayer for the people."

A mother asks prayers for her little baby, who is wasting because they have been unable to find proper food for it.

Dr. and Mrs. R. A. Bartlett of Lima, Ohio, ask an interest in our prayers, that their evangelistic work may be blessed a thousand-fold.

A young mother asks special prayers for healing, and a young wife asks prayers that her husband may be converted, and that they may be reunited and have guidance and spiritual advancement in their future life together.

Mrs. S. K. writes: "Have been reading some of the wonderful answers to prayer in the Prayer League, and I want to ask you to pray for my child. Earthly help has failed, and I feel that God alone can save him now, and make his mind and body normal."

Mr. J. C., Tr., Detroit, Mich., writes: "The Old Book tells us that His power never wanes. 'He is the same, yesterday, today and forever.' He fed Israel when they were in need, and in many other places in the Bible we find mention of His intervention. I have met with it exploring with camels in Central Australia—direct help. In Australia, years since, in times of dreadful drought, the Government set apart a day for special prayer for rain. Why should not our Government act in a somewhat similar manner for China's sake?"

Among the individual requests received are these: for healing, 150; guidance, 7; wisdom, 11; spiritual advancement, 15; reunion, 5; courage, 3; forgiveness, 9; faith, 22; peace, 8; conversion of relatives and friends, 99; patience, 2; and for financial aid, 15.

We have received acknowledgments of answered prayer from the following: Dr. J. M., M. B. S., Mrs. J. H. P., Mrs. W. B., R. A. B. and M. O.

The Right Hand—"Lift Up"

E. L. Acts 3: 1-7 (Mission Study)

THE Scripture lesson is one of the most beautiful pieces of literature in all the realm of prose and poetry. It is the "Gospel of the Helping Hand," described in detail. "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk." He who has nothing to give is poor, but he who has something to give and refuses, is poor indeed. The first may still be in grace, but the second is certainly in disgrace. "Such as we have." "We that are strong (in time, talents, money, manhood, womanhood, health, organizing ability, initiative for leadership) ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning."

"The faith of the head is the faith that is dead;

The faith of the heart is better in part, But the faith of the hand is the faith that will stand,

For the faith that will do must include the first two."

A young negro arrived in Boston for the first time seeking employment. As he struggled with his heavy bag across the intricate maze and congested traffic of the busy street, he felt a hand slipped in beside his own as a kindly man helped him to make his way across the street. The grateful boy thanked his new friend and the man replied, "Look up, lift up, and lend a hand." That boy was Booker T. Washington and that man Edward Everett Hale.

New Work Our Committees May Do

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Rev. 3: 7-13

"BEHOLD, I have set before thee an open door." That door has the word "Opportunity" on the one side and the word "Responsibility" on the other side. Opportunities and Responsibilities differ. It depends on where one lives, the conditions of environment, population, and many other things too numerous to mention. Church work is difficult because of this. Plans and programs from "Headquarters" will not suit all circumstances or meet all emergencies.

New work for committees is for the committees to decide more than anybody else. There are some guiding principles. Certainly, we are agreed, there is new work. There is always new work. "New occasions demand new duties, time makes ancient good uncouth." Let the committees meet and plan. Committees may overlap in their work. This is important: avoid overlapping. New work, too, lies in the province of personal work, getting new members. There is nothing that retards growth so much as monotony.

Committees may work for the elimination of some departments of the work as well as organizing new departments. They may simplify organization as well as multiply organization. See that you do not have more harness than horse. Study methods tried in other places. Spend time and money for the reading and purchasing of literature, on the particular phase of your work. You are engaged in the greatest enterprise in all the world. Spend and be spent to make it a success.

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He named it Powderpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is cold water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof, sanitary and durable for outside or inside painting. It is the easiest principle applied to paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Discussing Disarmament

Christian Herald Readers Express Their Views Regarding Peace Efforts

D. R. SHELTON'S editorial, "Suppose!" in the Christian Herald of January 15th, has evoked many interesting letters from our readers. Lack of space forbids the publication of all these letters, but we reproduce a few representative ones which indicate the widespread sentiment throughout the country in favor of the limitation of armaments.

Franklin Skillings, Woodford, Me., quotes from an address of Abraham Lincoln in 1837 words which are particularly apt. His letter follows:

"I have read and reread with much interest the editorial in the January 15th issue of the Christian Herald under the caption 'Suppose!' In reply to your question, I think it is high time that we take definite action in favor of disarmament. And I think all people who have the good and welfare of humanity at heart should unite to work for the discontinuance of preparations for war. Of course, whenever disarmament is mentioned, the fear instinctively arises in the minds of most people, that some strong and aggressive nation might attack us, but if we are a Christian nation, as so many people confidently affirm; why not accept the provisions made and set forth in the Bible for our protection and prosperity?"

"Those who would like to have the assurance of some man on that subject might read Abraham Lincoln's address before the young men's lyceum of Springfield, Ill., January 27, 1837. The subject was 'The Perpetuation of our Political Institutions.' Discussing the dangers that might threaten our institutions, he said in part: 'At what point shall we expect the approach of danger? By what means shall we fortify against it? Shall we expect some transatlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years. At what point, then, is the approach of danger to be expected? I answer, If it ever reach us, it must spring up amongst us, it cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of free men we must live through all time, or die by suicide.'

"I think it is a sin to go on preparing for war, and that Christians should unite and begin a passive resistance to it and make it known in a very positive manner."

H. P. PERRY, Trenton, N. J., declaring that "some one must break the ice," writes:

"If such a supposed policy of Congress were carried out, about 50 per cent. of the population of the United States would rejoice; 40 per cent. would be apathetic; 10 per cent. would be venomously resentful. This would be solely as their various interests were affected."

"What any of the various nations of the earth would 'immediately plan to do' we can only guess by past experience. If any nation or combination of nations planned in any way to dominate us, they would never 'let on' or admit it until their ulterior motive was past denial. Certainly! Some one nation must do the pioneering act, i. e., 'break the ice.' I covet for the United States that place in history."

"In all likelihood other nations would follow our example in a straggling way, with much 'hauling and pulling.' I can not conjecture the order of their going; whether Great Britain, Switzerland, or Siam."

REV. J. T. FISHER, Mt. Eaton, Ohio, says:

"You ask what would happen if disarmament took place. The first thing that would probably happen would be that God would pour out blessings on this old world, such as it never has had. How can the world expect fullness of Divine blessing when nations are against nations and blood is running free, shed by human hands? The cry for help coming from starving and underfed European countries, in addition to the millions who died from war causes, surely ought to be enough to open our eyes and wring from our hearts the prayer that God will cause our 'swords to be pounded into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks,' and 'that we shall learn war no more.' Untold blessings would come from such a decision."

"Another thing that would come, would be the fuller working of the Holy Spirit in conversion, for the more we think of war, and camps and training and high taxes for military training, the less chance is there for the Holy Ghost to work in men's lives on account of the hardening effects of war."

A FARMER'S view is given by Thomas H. Rainsford, Edgefield, S. C., as follows:

"I am a farmer away down here in South Carolina, but I have been reading the Christian Herald for about thirty years, and when I read the article on the Editorial Page of January 15, in regard to disarmament, I was amazed, and I thought this: If the United States were to disarm, it would be a calamity for the United States, and for the human family. Greed is as deep in the human heart as it ever was. I think if we were to reduce our armament just now, Japan would take over the Philippines and right on the heel of that stroke, she would take the Hawaiian Islands. She would then fortify the islands and also Guam in such a manner that the German fortifications of Heligoland would appear as a plaything; this would give her the key to the Pacific Ocean, she would colonize Mexico, and put in coal- ing stations and fortifications there. Just as sure as the sun shines, if the United States reduces her armament, Japan will soon be mistress of the Pacific, our great and expanding commerce would be driven from the sea, and our prestige gone. Christian civilization would have a backset that would take ages to regain."

"The Anglo-Saxon race, and Anglo-Saxon culture must advance; they can not stand still, and I do not believe the Creator intends they should retrograde, and while we are advancing we must be careful that we are not halted, by not being properly prepared."

THE time is ripe for a real test, says F. W. Hart, Murdock, Minn.:

"Relative to the question propounded by the Herald in its issue of January 15th, as to what would be the results if this nation should disarm, we would like to extend the query a little further. Suppose this nation should disarm, would it be possible, or profitable, for any other nation to undertake to govern over 100,000,000 people of the stamp of the American people, even though no armed resistance was offered? Could physical force triumph over moral force in this age of the world, if given a fair test? Is not the time ripe for nation as well as individual to put the teachings of Jesus Christ to the test; what do you think?"

THE United States has become the world's largest exporter of coal. Prior to the war, this country ranked third, America exports in 1913 having been less than 20,000,000 tons, as against 76,000,000 tons exported by Great Britain and 30,000,000 exported by Germany. In eight months of 1920, the United States exported 23,000,000 tons of coal, while Britain exported only 18,375,000 and Germany lagged far behind—these figures being exclusive of the "bunker coal" supplied to vessels engaged in foreign trade. Experts have estimated the world's stock of coal at 7,398,000,000 tons, of which fifty-two per cent. is in the United States.

Questions and Answers

M. W., Jacksonville, Ill. The natural man forgives reluctantly, if at all. There may be the expression of forgiveness without the assent of the spirit. Jesus Christ taught us to forgive freely, with the whole heart and purpose, and to have this free forgiveness find expression in our attitude, our speech and our whole duty towards our neighbor. God calls on us for a whole-hearted forgiveness; otherwise we need not ask Him to forgive us if we ourselves are unwilling to forgive. If He is ready, according to His promise, to forgive our sins, surely we ought to be willing and ready to forgive those who may have offended us. God hates sin, not the sinner, we are told specifically. Toward the sinner, in His great mercy He has only love and compassion. We are all weak and prone to sin, and we must have mutual forbearance. If we will not forgive others, we can not hope or expect forgiveness at God's hands. Therefore to pray for forgiveness while we ourselves cherish an unforgiving spirit, is to pray in vain. Such prayers increase our own condemnation. To make mutual forgiveness between man and man complete, there must be the same spirit in both. Repentance and confession are needed on both sides. Nor can the offender whom we desire to forgive justify his acceptance of our forgiveness, until he has first repented and admitted his fault. The unrepentant one simply shuts the door against complete forgiveness.

Mrs. C. L. A., Byron, Ill. The expressions "Kingdom of God" and "Kingdom of Heaven" are used in different senses in the scriptures. At times the "Kingdom of God" is meant to include the whole universe; again, the "Kingdom of Heaven" is applied to the celestial regions, where divine Majesty sits enthroned. In the Jewish church it was taught that there were various degrees or heights in the heavenly Kingdom (11 Cor. 12:2). The old rabbinical doctrines made the distinction of three heavens, viz., the firmament, the tarry heavens and the "heaven of heavens," which is the abode of the omnipresent God and the highest of His spiritual creation, and it is this latter heaven which Christ called "the use of his Father" (John 14:2). Still further, the phrase "Kingdom of Heaven" is frequently used in the Gospels as meaning that wherever the rule of Christ is set up in the hearts of men, "the Kingdom of Heaven is within you." When we pray "Thy Kingdom come," we look forward to the time when the rule of the earth will acknowledge God's supremacy and his rule will be universal.

C. P., Philadelphia. 1. The passage in John 1:27, 28 is regarded as an expression of the indication of Christ's spirit at the prospect of death which He now saw to be imminent. He had already spoken of it as the hour in which he should be glorified. One commentator writes: "He seems as if thinking aloud, feeling his way between two alternatives, looking forth of them sternly in the face, measuring, weighing them, that the choice actually made might be seen, and even by Himself be the more vividly felt, to be a profound, deliberate, instantaneous choice." In the two passages: "Father, save me from this hour," and "but this cause came I unto this hour," we have two sides of the proposition presented, the sentiment clearly conveyed being that, since was the Father's will that He should endure the Cross, He would accept that will and yield himself freely to it. Having declared His acceptance, He turns again to the Father (John 1:28) and as though in testimony of approval His submission and to cheer His spirit, came a heavenly voice which was heard by those standing by. 2. Of the passage in John 11:35 "Jesus wept," much has been preached and written. One authority says of the incident: "The weeping of Jesus consisted of silent tears. Is it for nothing that the Evangelist, some sixty years after it occurred, holds up to ages with such touching brevity the sublime spectacle of the Son of God in tears? Is it a seal of His perfect oneness with us, in the most redeeming feature of our stricken humanity?"

J. R. P., Newport, Wash., writes giving a farmer's view of things in his section, both social, religious and agricultural; also a few characteristic, helpful hints to those who think of settling down there. He writes: "I have just received a letter from a man in Kansas, who seems to think he has been called to straightway take his journey into a far country. People here as well as everywhere else expect a Christian to do his duty without ready-made pillows being sewed to his armholes. The chances of being a successful farmer are about as good in one part of the country as another. There is a fight on against those who have been exploiting the farmer on one end of the line and the consumer on the other end." J. R. P. wrote to the Kansas man: "I am willing to declare farming is a great game if you don't weaken. I have been at it, off and on (mostly off), for forty years, and I have not starved to death yet, though I have been on the ragged edge of it quite a few times. You imply as a reward for telling the truth that you are going to try to get others to move into my neighborhood. Now, that is something of a temptation to indulge in the truth just for the once; but I am going to resist the temptation, as every time I have told the truth about the country as an expert, the people who hired me got mad and would not pay me or hire me again." Then he adds: "Some of this land here would fulfil some of your conditions and some others, but I know of no place in the United States that will fulfil all your conditions. We who are here in the West have had the making of our own environment, and not without a fight right straight along." He tells him that they have churches of many denominations, and "we have progressed enough so that places of business close on Sundays, though a great many of our farmers, who came from the old country or the Middle West, work Sunday the same as any other day. We had open saloons Sunday when I came here twenty years ago, and our principal newspapers openly sneered at the churches, and Sabbath laws. Now these same papers give several columns or pages to the sermons. If you expect to settle down in a place where everybody respects and obeys the law without any fight on the part of law-abiding citizens, I have no place in mind to which I can refer you"; but in any event, if he should come there, he assures him that he will get "the glad hand, a life job and a hearty welcome," which is about as much as any one could wish for.

Mrs. T. A. McL., Magnolia, Del., writes: "The greatest need in this world is the need of making people better, and it is a task which must be begun in infancy. There should be mothers' monthly meetings to improve their methods of raising children and to teach them what is necessary. It is the duty of the parent, not of the Sunday school or the public school teacher, to start the children right. They ought to begin in infancy to teach them obedience and truth. Many others are ignorant and indifferent." She concludes her letter by suggesting that there could be no finer work for the W. C. T. U. to undertake than this.

Mrs. A. J. W., Prairie Point, Miss. The names of the men who were miraculously healed by the apostles (see Acts 3:2 and 14:8) are not given in Scripture.

H. B. C., Big Island, Va., writes: "We speak of dead churches and those whose influence has gone, because of the fact that Christ occupies a very small place in the hearts of their people. Until our churches place God first and His cause above all others, they will remain dead. In that church which exalts God and the Gospel of Salvation through Jesus Christ, the people will not feel the need of worldly amusements in order to bring life into their worship and to increase the membership. Our President-elect has told the people that he wants to go to the White House with their prayers in his behalf, and he wants them to feel that God is at the head and leading in all things. I trust he will not allow fame and high office to choke out that feeling, and I pray that his influence may spread until our government leaders realize that 'it is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die.'"

Mrs. H. C. K., Lancaster, Wis. We read of the comparative status of the redeemed and the angels in these passages: Heb. 2:7; Psa. 8:5; Luke 20:36; 1 Cor. 6:3, etc. Either of the two forms of statement would be right, in its proper place and connection.

"Keep clean inside"

Physicians Prescribe Nujol

"Scientists have found over 240 varieties of bacteria in the human intestine. They have estimated that the number of bacteria evacuated daily from the human system is one hundred and twenty trillion (120,000,000,000,000).

"Though many of these bacteria are harmless and some even beneficial, there are a countless number which are capable of doing serious harm. If constipation exists, putrefaction follows, with the result that many hitherto harmless strains of bacteria become malignant and produce virulent poisons which are absorbed by the blood and carried to every body cell.

Dangers of Constipation

"So constipation becomes the root-evil of many serious ailments. It means a continuous poisoning of the entire body, in time leading to high blood-pressure, arterio-sclerosis, liver, bladder and kidney diseases, etc."

To train the bowels to normal, healthy, daily evacuations most physicians recommend Nujol.

Nujol relieves constipation without any unpleasant or weakening effects. It does not upset the stomach, cause nausea or griping, nor interfere with the day's work or play.

Instead of irritating or forcing the system, Nujol simply softens the food waste. This enables the many tiny muscles in the walls of the intestines, contracting and expanding in their normal way, to squeeze the food waste along so that it passes naturally out of the system.

Prevents Constipation

Nujol actually prevents constipation because it helps Nature maintain easy, thorough bowel evacuation at regular intervals—the healthiest habit in the world.

Nujol is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take. Try it.

The World News of the Week

Plenty of work was awaiting him, however, on his arrival at St. Augustine, where he was to take up again the preparation of his inaugural address and resume conferences on the selection of his cabinet. Half a dozen prominent men had been invited to St. Augustine for conferences and the program of the President-elect for his stay there was an intensive one, with the mornings devoted to conferences and correspondence, the afternoons to recreation, and the evenings to the writing of his inaugural address.

Political gossip persisted, despite Mr. Harding's release from toil, and the presence of Senator Fall in the Harding party renewed discussion of his inclusion in the cabinet. It was believed Herbert Hoover's name for Secretary of the Interior had been dropped from Mr. Harding's tentative slate, but announcement of the cabinet appointments was not expected until shortly before March 4.

Dr. Manning Elected Bishop

REV. DR. WILLIAM T. MANNING, rector of Trinity Parish, was elected bishop of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York to succeed the late Bishop Charles S. Burch, leading on each ballot, but not obtaining a majority until the third ballot. His strongest opponents were Dr. Charles L. Slattery, rector of Grace Church; Dr. Ernest M. Stires, rector of St. Thomas' Church; and Bishop Nathaniel S. Thomas of Wyoming. After the second ballot the name of Dr. Stires was withdrawn; and Dr. Manning was elected with 126 clerical and 75 lay ballots, to 109 clerical and 64 lay ballots for Dr. Slattery, his nearest opponent. The election then was made unanimous on motion of Dr. Stires.

The new bishop belongs to the High Church party of the Episcopal Church and is the first of that party to head the New York diocese in more than half a century. He was born in Northampton, England, in 1866, but came to America with his parents when sixteen years old and settled in Nebraska. He received his collegiate education in the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., and was graduated from the theological school connected with that institution in 1893. His first pastorate was at Redlands, Cal., and he became head of Trinity Parish, famous for its great wealth, in 1908.

Dr. Manning has been an ardent advocate of the reunion of Christendom, and a book of Church Unity written by him has been published recently. He was earnest in urging America's entry into the World War and served for a year as a voluntary chaplain at Camp Upton, near New York City, his age preventing his going to France as a chaplain.

DOMESTIC

SENATE PASSES PACKING BILL. The bill creating the Federal Livestock Commission, designed to regulate the meat-packing industry, was passed by the Senate by a vote of 46 to 33, virtually unchanged from the form in which it was reported by the Committee on Agriculture. A hard fight in the House was forecast.

HUGE FUND IN TREASURY VAULTS. Completion of the first count since 1913 of cash and securities in the United States treasury showed a grand total of $13,883,819,826.36, of which $97,410,283.02 was in cash. The count was necessitated by the resignation of John Burke as treasurer, and revealed no shortage.

TWO MORE INDICTED IN GRAFT INQUIRY. The inquiry into departments of the New York city administration, conducted by former Governor Whitman, has resulted in the indictment of two detective sergeants on charges of taking fees for the recovery of stolen automobiles. Two police captains previously had been held on graft charges. Mr. Whitman asserted many thousands of dollars had been paid for the recovery of stolen cars, and divided illegally by a small coterie of policemen.

BIG SAVING FROM PROHIBITION. A statement issued by the Anti-Saloon League of America estimated the saving from the first year of prohibition at $1,000,000,000. The whiskey consumption was placed at 5,581,553 gallons in 1920, as contrasted with 89,641,985 gallons in 1917.

FOREIGN

SWISS BEGIN DRY FIGHT. A movement has been started in Switzerland for an amendment to the constitution which will give to the cantonments and communes local option regarding the sale of intoxicants. The 30,000 signatures necessary for an initiative petition are being obtained, but strong opposition has arisen, especially from the hotel interests which fear the ruin of the tourist business.

BRITISH LABOR THREATENS GENERAL STRIKE. A general strike to force the government to adopt labor's plans for the solution of the unemployment problem in Great Britain was threatened at the national conference of the Trades Union Congress and the Labor Party in London. The moderate elements prevailed, but the radicals manifested alarming strength.

ATTEMPT TO SEIZE BERGDOLL IN GERMANY. An attempt by a party of Americans to kidnap Grover C. Bergdoll, under sentence in America as a draft evader, at Eberbach, Germany, caused a sensation in that country. It was announced he had applied for and received German citizenship.

Hebrew-Christian Work in Russia

By H. L. HELLYER

FOR the past three years, a cloud of thick darkness has covered Russia like a pall. Yet, in the midst of persecution, the Church of God has renewed its strength, and in many parts of the land evangelical Christian communities have sprung up and flourished.

One of the most remarkable of these is the Hebrew-Christian Church at Kieff, which came into existence in 1917 and survived not a few alarming vicissitudes. In that year Mr. Peter Goroditch, a Hebrew-Christian missionary, who had labored at Grodno and, since 1915, at Homel, was forced to move to Kieff. Being near the front, that town was overcrowded with panic-stricken refugees and offered an unusual opportunity for the Gospel witness. Mr. Goroditch found a small Hebrew-Christian nucleus—three or four families and a few single individuals—who hailed his coming. He obtained a house with a mission hall, and soon services were in full swing. The hall was crowded week by week. At the end of a year's work the usual steps were taken to procure the necessary government sanction which would enroll the congregation among publicly acknowledged religious bodies, and in June, 1918, the little community received public sanction.

The movement now made rapid progress. Members of various evangelical churches sought fellowship as associates, full membership being restricted to Hebrew-Christians. In 1918, however, just when it seemed as if the fruit of faithful labor was to be gathered in, the Germans entered Kieff and the workers received notice to quit the premises within an hour and a half. Mr. Goroditch, however, was permitted to arrange for continuing his work in a house which could be adapted to the requirements. This was done, and soon the work was in full operation again.

The revival of spiritual interest which had begun some months before was now at its flood-tide. All the churches in the district were crowded and a spirit of earnest inquiry was spreading. The Jews in and about Kieff were profoundly affected, and inquirers from the provinces came to the mission hall. Sometimes little commissions of inquiry, consisting mostly of young people, came to "spy out the land."

In 1919 Mr. Goroditch received the status of an accredited evangelical pastor, in charge of a Hebrew-Christian congregation (a step which involved his passing a theological examination before a court of law) and had the joy of baptizing three groups of believers, mostly young people belonging to better-class Jewish families, among them several students and a lady doctor. The congregation now included 48 members in Kieff itself and several families in neighboring centers, besides a considerable number of adherents who professed faith in Christ, but were undergoing probation before being received into full membership.

Many of the Russian clergy have visited the services or directed Jewish inquirers to them. Among prominent ecclesiastics, Bishop Lavrov, who recently seceded from the Russian Orthodox Church, was profoundly impressed by the meetings.

The Hebrew-Christian congregation at Kieff is one more witness to the fruitifying power of tribulation. It is emphatically the child of evil times. Since its foundation, Kieff has been under thirteen different governments. Ten times the town was in a state of siege, four times battle actually raged in the streets. Twice shells fell upon the mission house, and on one of these occasions the inmates had an almost miraculous escape. On another occasion a gas bomb fell into the cellar and half killed one of Mr. Goroditch's assistants. Over and over again every pane of glass in the house was broken.

Mr. Goroditch and his colleagues are living and working in unconquerable faith, and God is honoring their trust in Him.

WESTERN civilization is increasing rather than diminishing missionary problems in Mesopotamia. Throughout the villages boys are eager to get to the semi-Europeanized cities where "great factories line the river bank where women are cheap and excitement plentiful."

The North Land

By Margaret E. Sangster

*THIS is the land of darkness,
Where only the snow is white;
Where the sun, like a fury, flashes
A call through the frozen night.
This is the land of failure,
Where truth stands alone, and chill—
But this is the land of the reaching hand,
And the soul that says: "I will!"*

*Many the land has broken,
Many grim truth has slain
But a few have won to an ice-bound grail,
A few, of a noble strain.
They have come through the raging blizzard,
With a faith that no night could mar,
And have paved the way for the break of day,
By the light of a single star.*

*This is the land of darkness,
Where only a red sun glows;
This is the land of grim despair
Of tempests, and frosts, and snows.
This is the land of heart-break,
Of failures that break and kill—
But this is the land of the reaching hand
And the soul that says, "I will!"*

The Yankee Consul on the Job

A Close-Up View of His Work in Promoting American Interests Abroad

By FREDERICK SIMPICH

(of the United States Consular Service)

THE loafing, convivial American Consul—adventurous and picturesque, made famous by Richard Harding Davis—is no longer a superannuate in the great drama of our overseas activities. Fiction and the stage still cling fondly to this often lovable and always interesting character—but in real life he no longer leads the ragged rebels to victory, storms the adobe palace and mercifully punches the garlic-fed governor's nose, or rescues the beautiful heiress from a dark and dingy dungeon.

Today his place is filled by a highly trained, energetic official, who spurns the wassail and gay life that made his predecessor famous. Official inspectors make the rounds, too, from Teheran to Tokio, to see that there's no let-up in the spurning; and ipso facto, the closer the inspector, the more frantic the spurning!

And whether you're a Democrat, a Republican, or a Groper makes no difference; politics no longer figures in naming consuls. Young men of good repute are designated for examination by the president; they must stand a stiff test in law, language, economics, etc., and must be physically fit. They make the grade, they're usually nominated and confirmed by the Senate. This plan began a decade or more ago, and today America is represented abroad by a vigorous group of clean-cut, ambitious officers, bent on carving out careers in our foreign service. Sometimes they even carve their way clear out—ad cash in their trade experience by joining a big bank or export house.

Even in old days an "examination" of sorts was held, and a candidate for a post in China. "It is inferred of course that you know something of the Chinese language?" intimated an official. "Ask me something in Chinese, and see!" parried the candidate. But such a bluff would be called now, for they have them in Washington who speak every tongue from Japanese to Hindustani.

ONE of the remaining weak spots in our Foreign Service—from Embassy to Consular Agency—is the lack of good clerks. They're scarce as fresh dodo eggs," an inspector told me. Many adventurous young Americans, eager for a lark abroad at Uncle Sam's expense, are willing to go over as clerks in the consulates—but few seem to stick. They pine for the jazz and uproar of home life—and hurry back to it. Others stay till they've learned the foreign language and become really useful—and then with some American export house at a higher salary than the government pays. Our consulates are usually sadly undermanned.

In a hazy way the average American knows that the Yankee Consul flies the flag, keeps erring tourists out of trouble, and occasionally pens a literary gem telling how many tons of whale blubber were boiled in smchatka in the autumn of 1855. Or, the Sunday papers may tell us an enterprising consul in Fiji has photographed a new seaport, or sent a lock of its hair to the Smithsonian, or the rebels have stoned the consulate at Malaterra, or an earthquake has shaken it down, or the lonely consul is dead of the plague.

But the actual functions and grave possibilities of the modern consul are little known to most of us, since he lives

Discouraging undesirable immigration is one of the consul's important duties. Here is a crowd of Polish emigrants awaiting visas at the consulate in Warsaw. Sometimes as many as 3,000 were in line and works in foreign lands and is seldom in the public eye.

In his "Practice of Diplomacy," John W. Foster says: "Numerous and onerous are the duties required of the consul, and what varied talents are called into play! He is made by law the foreign guardian of our tariff system, of American shipping and sailors, the protector of American citizens abroad; he becomes a material factor in enforcing our immigration laws and excluding undesirable aliens from our population; he assigned the consul a place to sleep—in a big barrack-like room where a lot of native ruffians were quartered.

Everybody knew this man was there to fix the blame for the crime. One giant half-breed, the ring-leader of the band that had done the killing, in drunken bravado came up—a six-shooter in his belt—and tried to shake hands with the little man from North Carolina. But the consul put his hand behind him. "He's insulted Juan—now Juan will shoot him!" breathed the crowd. Ignoring them, the consul went to his cot, undressed and knelt to say his prayers. Suddenly the room became very quiet—and the gunman sneaked out.

IN MANY emergencies a consul must act quickly—and report afterward. And, though no longer clothed in any diplomatic character, no man needs more diplomacy in his work.

In a recent case two American civil engineers were arrested, tied on a riata and led off to a cemetery. Here they were compelled—at the point of a Mauser—to dig graves and bury rebels and patriots who had fallen in that day's stroke for "freedom." The only charge against the Americans was that they had permitted an "enemy" troop train to pass over a bridge which they were repairing! At dark, the two men were locked in a foul adobe stable with a score of Indian prisoners—and it was hinted that the next day they should face a firing squad. In the meantime, the consul heard of their plight. His prompt telegram to the military governor may not have been couched in that chaste, lofty diction so dear to the diplomatic heart—but it freed the engineers.

Although minus the plush pants and toy swords of diplomatic plumage, the con-

Too often the American flag flies over sheds like this, which houses the American consular office at an important Chilean port. And appearances count for much in winning trade. A "galvanized iron hen-house" like this does not help sul enjoys certain special privileges because of his representative character. Some of these have been secured by consular conventions or stipulations in treaties. Consuls are exempt by treaty, in many countries, from arrest, except for high crimes, from the obligation to appear in court as witnesses, and from taxation, military service, billeting, etc.

In Oriental lands where the right of extraterritoriality exists, consuls enjoy most of the immunities of diplomatic representatives, such as certain rights of precedence, freedom from customs inspections, and salutes from the native military. Sometimes, too, the right of asylum is respected as to consulates, the same as to legations and embassies.

WHEN American naval vessels visit foreign ports, special courtesies are exchanged between the consul and the commanders. Consuls rank with captains in the navy and colonels in the army; and regulations set down how calls shall be made and prescribe the number of saluting guns to which consuls are entitled.

If a revolution suddenly breaks out in Shinaga, and the exuberant patriots in the glee of new-found freedom make a bonfire of the Standard Oil warehouse, the Yankee consul at the port of Tortuga Gorde may cable for a gunboat. But the navy commander, when he arrives, merely confers with the consul as to ways and means; he gets his own orders only from the Navy Department. Landing a small force to protect the consulate, however, is not an unusual proceeding—especially in turbulent countries.

The secret cipher or official code-book of the State Department is supplied to all our consuls, to conceal their messages from telegraph operators and the general public.

In war times the responsibilities of consuls are much increased; protecting our trade and treaty rights, our shipping, and watching to see that the rules of neutrality are not violated is a big part of their work.

In China our American consuls have been singularly successful in keeping Uncle Sam informed as to the trend of political and economic affairs.

To get better team work and insure unity of action and control, many American statesmen favor the consolidation of our consular and diplomatic services. Certain European countries already have done this, in one way or another. "If we adopt this plan and carry it out," said a high official of our State Department, "the results would be most advantageous alike to commerce, international intercourse, the individual American citizen and to the upbuilding of our foreign service. But along with any development of the two branches of the foreign service, must come the enlargement and upbuilding of the State Department itself. The President says the United States has just reached its majority as a world power. Surely if that be true, it must call for such an enlargement of the State Department as will put it on a plane of equality with like departments of the principal nations of the world."

Uncle Sam's consular trade machinery is of in-

This is the United States consulate at Tsingtau, China. Such buildings help to win trade for America abroad, but they are all too few finite value to those exporters who make use of it. Nearly every day a busy consul cables from some part of the world, urging that American business men be put on the trail of contracts that are to be let, or big purchases to be made by governments or individuals. Millions of dollars' worth of goods are sold abroad each month as a direct result of trade intelligence work done by consuls. Proof of this rests in the fact—as I hinted once—that each year watchful banks and trading concerns lure some of Uncle Sam's best consuls back into private life—by offering them more money. One consul lately was offered more than three times what our Government was paying him.

With the rise of our new merchant marine, our ships are poking their noses into every harbor of the world; our flag is flying where it hasn't been seen since the romantic days of whalers and clipper ships, when rum was a part of the ration, and when we carried 92 per cent. of all our trade in our own bottoms. And consuls have intimate supervision over these ships.

The American sailor is the consul's particular charge; he saves him from oppression and bad treatment, and if a sailor finds himself stranded and destitute in a foreign port the consul will relieve his distress and sign him on a homeward bound ship. The American seaman is the only Yankee entitled by law to be sent home at government expense, if he "gets on the beach" in a foreign land.

Often comedy beams along the consular path. Once, in a lonely mosquito port, a convivial but highly entertaining American was sentenced to jail for a good cause. By cleverly cultivating native jailers, he was eventually allowed to pass a portion of each day on the streets on parole. As time passed—and because jail rations were scarce—this time limit was gradually extended till finally the "prisoner" spent the whole day in the streets, and hustled for all his own food. It was stipulated, at that stage of the game, that he should return to the jail every night at nine o'clock. One night the American Consul was aroused by a loud rattle. It was the prisoner.

"Look here, Consul," he complained, "my sentence ain't up yet, but when I got to the jail tonight, a little bit late, the scoundrels wouldn't let me in! I protested, Consul! I've got a right to sleep in the jail."

IMMIGRANTS for America swarm to the consulate on steamer day to have their passports viséd, and it is the consul's duty to discourage persons taking passage who might be disbarred on arrival here—such as convicts, anarchists, polygamists, idiots, paupers, the incurably diseased, and those coming for immoral purposes. You can easily imagine what disturbances of order occur. Not long ago nearly 3,000 men, women and children were lined up before the American Consulate at Warsaw, and some are said to have waited in line for ten days—being relayed times by relatives!

Even at small and remote consular posts, emergencies may arise calling for the greatest tact, courage and initiative—to save some American's life or to protect the prestige and good name of our Government. Unlike the brilliant feats of our army and navy, however, most of the splendid deeds of our faraway, isolated consuls are—by their very nature—doomed to burial in secret archives, unprinted and unsung.

With fewer than 400 consuls Uncle Sam covers the earth; he has them posted, as trade and political satellites, in every important world center—as well as in the very fringes of civilization. In Africa and Asia the consul and the missionary go hand in hand—carrying the flag and the Cross forward together.

The Fight to Stop the Morphia Trade

IT IS an ominous warning to us that China's national prohibition of the vice of opium, as wonderful as our national prohibition of intoxicating beverages, is having a "come-back" in morphia smuggling from Japan into China, which is a case of more and worse devils returning to the swept and garnished house. Until recently this morphia was mostly imported from Edinburgh and London drug manufacturers. The conscience of Great Britain made such persistent protest against this international crime that Philadelphia and New York, in our Mayflower year, took precedence of London and Edinburgh in this form of exports.

The very firms that have dishonored us by these shipments stood recently before a committee of Congress, opposing legislation which would effectively break up this American partnership with the smuggling poisoners of other lands. This poisoning is not only killing individual bodies and souls, but is putting the stain of "the black poison" on Old Glory to the injury of our trade and our prestige. China's intense dislike of Japan passes over to us when morphia cans bearing the imprint of American firms are captured in the hands of Japanese smugglers in China, whose sorrows from famine should prevent the hardest heart from adding this additional burden.

It is a matter of interest that the effort of good Americans to checkmate the wrongdoing of other Americans started on the Pacific Coast, where everything Oriental is supposed to be held in disdain. The first bill introduced as a remedy was the Jones-Miller bill, bearing the names of a senator and a representative from the State of Washington, and it was a commercial body, the China Club of Seattle, that drew the bill. William K. McKibben, secretary of that club, made the principal speeches at Congressional hearings, secured by the International Reform Bureau, of which the writer is superintendent.

At the second hearing the legislative agents of both retail and wholesale druggists declared they would interpose no objection to the law, but the chief offenders, the manufacturers, were presently heard from and all drug interests said in chorus, with unintended humor, "Let the League of Nations do it." It was the old device of seeking delay and the weakest enforcement.

THE debate having shown the need of some recognition in the bill of our treaty obligations, a new bill was introduced by Representative Henry T. Rainey, who fearlessly attacked the morphia poisoners in the last Congress, and who believes it was their opposition that defeated him last November. This bill has received the approval of the State, Commerce and Treasury Departments, which are unitedly given very large discretion to prohibit exports to countries that re-export for wrong uses, as well as discretion to limit severely the supply of raw material for making morphia. The international Reform Bureau has also approved the bill, and on January 21 secured its introduction in the Senate by Senator Charles Curtis.

It is known as the Rainey-Curtis Anti-Dope Bill and has a good "fighting chance" to pass if quickly and strongly supported by a nation-wide barrage of telegrams and letters and petitions and deputations, urging congressmen and senators not to allow money measures to prevent the passage of Rainey-Curtis Anti-Dope Bill to protect China and other foreign lands against morphia smugglers, and our own country against dope peddlers, whose supplies will also be mostly cut off if this law is passed.

The hearings brought out good evidence that cutting out alcohol does not drive men to drug addiction, but the reckless after-the-war spirit makes it a real peril, which true patriots and alert Christians should hasten to checkmate by voting through mail and telegraph for this bill, which undoubtedly will pass if brought to a vote, but will not get to that goal unless Christian citizens unite their efforts.

This is the heart of the bill:

"Exports shall be consigned to only an authorized permittee, and upon the furnishing of adequate proof that the drug to be exported is to be used exclusively for medicinal purposes within the country to which exported, that it will not be re-exported, and that there is an actual shortage of and a demand for the drug for medicinal purposes within the country to which the export is consigned. And the importation of opium or cocaine or any salt, derivative, or preparation of opium or cocaine hereafter is hereby declared to be unlawful, provided such amounts of opium, and coco leaves, or other crude narcotics may be found necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce to provide morphine, cocaine, or other needed medicinal preparations for legitimate uses may be imported under regulations to be prescribed by Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce. The privilege of 'in transit' shipments is hereby withdrawn so far as it applies to shipments of opium, cocaine, and their above-named salts, derivatives, and preparations, unless such shipments are approved by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Commerce."

And we must not forget that law is not sufficient of itself. When we went before Secretary J. P. Hay, asking our Government to interpose against China against British opium, the Golden Rule Secretary, recalling our fathers' appeal not only to a but also to international public opinion, quietly suggested that "we should once more appeal to deities regard for the opinions of mankind." This time speakers and writers persistently appeal to the supreme court of the world against the poisoning of China by Britain, Japan and the United States. The good citizens of these countries and others have the ability and so the responsibility to stop it.

Waking Up Arabian-Nights Africa

AN AMERICAN village perched on a North African mountain peak symbolizes the way in which even the land of the Arabian Nights is being invaded by modern influence.

There, in the almost impenetrable stronghold of the mountains, is a village where some member or members of every family have been to Chicago and speak English—after a fashion.

It began many years ago when one inhabitant of the village found his way across the sea and overland to the Windy City. He came back with enough money to buy a dozen wives, but he built a fine house instead. Other villagers inquired just how he had traveled to Chicago, in what house he had lived and with what firm he had worked—and they set out to do likewise. Thus gradually there has been developed on this lonely mountain peak a Little Chicago where may be heard the strains of the American phonograph and harmonica, the whirr of the American alarm-clock and the spice of American slang.

A Little London graces another peak. The first adventurer went to London, so the others followed. Fragments of cockney speech have here been mixed in with the native Kabyle dialect. Native cooking has been modified a little under the influence of London's culinary art. On gala occasions a frock coat or a cane may be seen, and one intrepid pioneer brought home a monocle—but was never permitted to wear it.

In another village, the artery of whose civilization leads to the heart of France, Parisian fashions arrive about ten years late and peculiar affection is bestowed upon the French, an affection certainly not felt by most Kabyles.

THUS invisible threads of sympathy lead out from these remote villages to the great cities of Europe and the West. But let us be careful not to seem to exaggerate the modernizing of Kabylia. The villages mentioned are oases of modernism in a wilderness of medievalism. People fifteen miles away from the American village, for example, not only are not influenced by it—they do not even know that the village exists. The reason is that back from the French military road travel is almost impossible in this perpendicular country. What a blessing elevators would be! Most of the distance between two points must be measured vertically. There are few places in the world where one may throw a stone half a mile. The boy in a Kabyle village who throws a stone is apt to crack the head of someone in the next village, half a mile below.

Near the main road I have seen a village so close that the children could be made out, playing in the streets. On a level path it could have been reached in three or four minutes. But there was no level path, or suspension bridge, and it took us two hours of the stiffest sort of climbing down through tangled valleys and up steep slopes before we finally panted into the village. This was in only moderately mountainous country.

In the most mountainous sections the villagers on one peak will gaze upon the villagers on another peak year in and year out and never meet.

Considering the miles of weary vertical travel from one village to another, and the desolate distances one may go without meeting a soul, one is astonished to learn from the reports that this is one of the most densely populated sections in the world—500 to 600 a square mile!

The joker is that the census men measure their square miles horizontally and not up and down and around! For example, in one horizontal square mile of wild mountain country there might be five square miles of actual land surface. And on a space where there would be room for only one village if the land were flat, there may be half a dozen villages, so many that on a map they would almost overlap, while in reality it is a long journey up and down the cliff-like mountain sides from one village to another.

of the warm valleys up past the olive, fig and fir trees to the lonesome ash above, which are the barren, snow-covered heights.

How to pasture sheep and goats in a vertical country is a problem. The goat may cling to the cliff, but the grass will not. Often the only green thing is the ash tree—hence this tree has come to be known as "the Kabyle pasture." The owner of such a tree is fortunate. He rents it out to his neighbors who cut off the leaves for their animals. This very frequent pruning causes each limb to end in a big knot and the tree looks like a giant with a hundred fists.

The Kabyles are an independent people as mountain climbers are apt to be. They are not Arabs, and are far superior in honesty and integrity to the Arabs of Algeria. Curious that the people most "on the level" in North Africa should live in a land where nothing is level! Kabyle women go unveiled and enjoy considerable freedom. The people as a whole are said to be descended from North European races, perhaps remotely the same from which came the ancestors of our own Pilgrim Fathers. They are white, fresh-skinned folk, often blonde.

At one time they were Christians. Now, although they are nominally Mohammedans, they still retain many Christian customs, and their legends abound in curious distortions of Bible tales.

They have a peculiar version as to how Eve came to eat the apple. The serpent asked Eve if she knew the real reason why the fruit of the apple tree had been forbidden to her. She was all curiosity at once. "Because," explained the serpent, "the apples are wanted for Adam's second wife." Eve was sure he was lying—for was not she the only woman in the world? "No," said the serpent, "you are not. Come to the corner of the garden tomorrow and I will show you another woman." The next day she came to the place appointed. The serpent held up the world's first mirror and Eve looked through the bushes into the mirror and saw what she supposed was another woman. In a rage of jealousy Eve went and ate the apple.

SUCH warped versions of the Bible are slowly being corrected nowadays by all too few Christian missionaries. One athletic, cliff-climbing preacher has told the Story so constantly that he has been called the "Lord Jesus man"—or "Lord Jesus" for short. In a certain village he has a special Kabyle friend called Moses. So when he visits this particular village, everyone calls to him, "Hello, Lord Jesus, are you going to the house of Moses?" He is a good tooth-puller and a fair physician and combines these arts with his preaching. Although a learned man, he makes himself a friend of the people and will help a man catch an errant goat, or sit down with a family in a cobble-stone hut and eat with them a meal of cous-cous, acorns and thrushes' brains as easily as he will lecture before a learned society on the entymology of the Berbers.

Those who suppose that a missionary is just anyone who can't make good at anything else should examine into the accomplishments of the missionary staff in Algeria and Tunisia. A mission board secretary made the following tabulation during a visit to North Africa:

"E. F. Frease, the Superintendent, knows Gujarati, Mahrati, Hindustani, French, English, and reads Spanish and Italian.

"W. E. Lowther speaks German, French, Spanish, Malay, Esperanto, English and Arabic. He has a reading knowledge of Greek, Latin and Italian.

"Friederich Roesch, killed in the War, spoke Arabic, Italian, French, German, English, Koptic, deciphered Koptic manuscripts and constructed a grammar. He was an archeologist of note.

"J. T. C. Blackmore speaks Kabyle, French and English.

"Percy Smith speaks French, English, Arabic; is a fine Greek and Hebrew scholar; is a composer of music and a translator. He has translated the Bible into Arabic.

"J. J. Cooksey and J. H. C. Purdon speak French, English, Arabic and read Greek and Hebrew.

"The women missionaries in Algiers speak Kabyle, French and English. The women missionaries in Constantinople speak Arabic, French and English."

MISSIONARIES of such caliber are necessary in North Africa. Nowhere else in the world, not even excepting Japan, is the task of the missionary so difficult as here.

Why? Some say it is because, "Once a Moslem, always a Moslem." But that is not quite true. In other parts of the world, such as India and Malaysia, thousands of Mohammedans have risen to Christianity. And even in North Africa the Kabyles are quite readily reached. But the Arab stays "set" in his old religion. I do not think it is because the religion is so ideal, but because the Arab is the "set" kind of a person. He clings in the same way to everything else that is ancient. The Director of Indigenous Arts in Fez told me that he had recently come upon a book written in the fourteenth century and describing Fez as it was at that time. The Director compared the statements in the book, item by item, with Fez as it is today—and found the book to be perfectly up-to-date. Reprint it and it would pass very well as a modern account of present-day Fez. The people of Fez are still doing things just as they did them in medieval times.

Of course cities nearer the coast have been changed—but that is because foreign influence has come in. The Arabs on their own initiative would change nothing.

Moreover the Arab is proud—proud in the conceit of his past traditions. In his stately, flowing garments he moves down the street in haughty ignorance that times have changed since his pirate ancestors roved the seas up and down the Barbary Coast, exacting tribute from ships of all nations. Before the year 1800 the United States had paid more than two million dollars of tribute money into the coffers of the Dey of Algiers. "You bring me tribute and you are my slave," said the Dey to the captain of an American ship. "Here is a message. I order you as a slave to take it for me to Constantinople." And such was the power of the pirates of Barbary that the American captain did as he was told.

THE robbers of the seas have had some bitter experiences during the last century—but they remain quite satisfied with themselves and bask in the glory of days gone by. To them, all that was, was splendid. All that is, is anathema. They fight modernism step by step.

And, as for religion, why should the Moslem give up Mohammedanism, which provides him with two angels to accompany him wherever he goes; sanctions lying in three cases—to women, to reconcile friends, and in war; teaches that women are of long hair and small understanding and should be subservient to men in all things; and brings him when he dies to a Paradise where he is given a mansion with eighty thousand servants, a feast of three hundred courses, seventy-two of the beautiful, enticing musk girls of Paradise as his wives—also his old clay wives of earth if he wants them? Why should he give up all these things and accept Christianity, which limits him strictly to one wife, honesty and painful uprightness?

A native Kabyle pastor and his family. American missionaries are doing effective work in this region

Such an elastic and voluptuous religion as that of Islam can be donned and worn like an easy garment. The Arab sees no reason for casting off so flowing a robe of righteousness; and the pagan blacks of Central Africa are easily persuaded to put it on. Moslem traders who go south across the Sahara to the land of the blacks, carry their religion along with them and teach it while they sell their goods. Would that American commercial travelers were as faithful.

The pagan sees much to gain and nothing to lose by accepting Mohammedanism. He is not asked to make any abrupt break with paganism, such as would be required if he adopted Christianity.

EVERY eighth person in the world is a Mohammedan—and the proportion is growing. Whole tribes in Central and West Africa are "converted" to Islam almost overnight. Needless to say, the Arab is proud of the sweep of his religion—proud and self-satisfied. A missionary reports the following conversation with a Moslem trader:

"You white men know much about this world," said Mahomet Ali. "You own steamers and railways; you know all things concerning great guns and dynamite. Yet of one thing you know nothing."

"You know nothing of ganat el Fardous (Paradise). You fear not God, and you will go at your death to Gehennem (Hell). You are lords of this world, but we shall have our reward in the next."

"But we do know of God," said the Christian.

"You do not show it," returned Mahomet. "For I have never seen a government man kneel down to pray; never have I heard one speak of Allah—except in swearing. True, I have heard of a Khanissa (church) of white men on the coast. But they go there one day each week, and for six long days it is empty. We Mohammedans pray five times each day. I know that some of your Khanissa priests wish to make Christians of the natives, but they are so few and so weak that for every native they convert there kneel ten newly pledged Moslems. You may have the country—we do not care since we have the people. Perhaps we shall also one day gain the land."

The Christian may well blush, considering how little the Christian missionaries have accomplished in comparison with the Mohammedan. There are tens of thousands of villages, penetrated by the Moslem propagandist, where no Christian missionary has ever been seen. A missionary, appealing for help, reported:

"During the last fourteen years eighty more American missionaries have been sent to Japan than to the entire continent of Africa—a country as large as the United States, all Europe, all China, all India and a baker's dozen of Japans combined."

THE place to stop the flood of Islam over Africa is where it begins—in Arab North Africa. And there it is scarcely worth while trying to readjust the firmly rooted notions of the grown Arab. The children are the hope of the future.

The all too few North African children under missionary influence are learning that what makes an automobile go is not a djinn or devil—that the loss of the head-lock does not necessarily mean that you will not go to Heaven because Allah will have nothing by which to take hold and draw you up—that the world is not flat, and there is no edge of the earth over which one may fall—and that true religion involves something more than facing the east and murmuring a stereotyped phrase five times a day.

A Welcome for the Stranger

I KNOW I'm going to like that church," my friend said, "for I can see they mean business, and that's the kind of church I want to work with."

Rather striking sentences, these, and coming as they did, at the close of a little story provoked by a merely casual query as to where my friend had gone to church the Sunday before, they are significant.

My friend—we will call him George Jordan—is a business man about forty-five years old, who had recently moved to a new home in a new section of his city, far enough away from his old church to make it unlikely that he would be recognized. He had been active enough in his old church to earn a place on the Board. Furthermore, he likes to see things go in the church, just as he makes them go in his own business.

The new home is about equidistant from two churches, both comparatively new, one catering almost entirely to a well-do-do class; the other, a struggling cause, located in the middle of a working-people's district. One had heard reports from the latter, from time to time, of vigorous growth and of climbs over obstacles which were, considering known circumstances, rather surprising.

YOU know how it is in a new district?" George suggested, when he began to answer my query. "We didn't know anybody, and things around the house were rather upset, and for a couple of Sundays we didn't go anywhere. And then we made up our minds we were going to try both churches."

"In the morning we wandered down to the smaller one. It didn't look very inviting. They haven't really built their church yet, you see, and are using the Sunday-school section till they can finance the bigger undertaking. And when we looked at that stubby sort of place, with a blank wall in front, and only one entrance at the side, things didn't look any too promising. But—" (the enthusiasm began to come when he lived the scene over again) "but you forget that when you get inside that door. We hardly had time to open it when a nice-looking chap

An Account Which Should Help the Church Reception Committee

By EDWARD MOORE

with a good warm hand rushed up to us. He seemed to look me over for a second or two to see whether I belonged, and then said: 'Just come this way,' and before we knew it, we were shot across a hall and into a comfortable little reception-room. Waiting there was a big stout fellow with a smile as long as his arm, and in about half a minute he had my name and address, had found out about my little daughter, had introduced himself as chairman of the membership committee, and had given me a pocketful of literature about the church. He had a way with him, and you couldn't but feel that you were in a place where they were interested in you and wanted you to be one of them.

"After a minute or two there, he took us out into one of the best seats in the church, and took my coat away from me when I got it off, saying that I would be more comfortable with it hung up at the back. Since the place was crowded, I guess he was right."

"I thought that was about all that could be done," George went on, still enthusiastically. "But it wasn't. Right after the service a dozen people came up, likely-looking fellows, some of them, called me by name and welcomed us to 'our' church. And a minute or two later the preacher was around doing the same thing."

THAT was all that happened on Sunday, apparently, and I fancy most of you will think it was enough. But it wasn't by any means the end.

"A couple of nights after, I was sitting up in my den," George went on, "when after the maid had answered a ring at the door, a quiet sort of chap about my own age came up and introduced himself as being from the church. We talked business and lodge, and city politics, and every once in a while that scout would try to lead back to the church. I wanted to test him out, so I made it as hard as I could for him, like you do with a salesman you don't like very much, but he stood up to his guns like a hero. And how he did play up that church!

"And then next night, when I answered the 'phone, there was some little girl inquiring for Helen. It was one of the girls from the church, who wanted to call and take her down to Sunday school next Sunday. I know I'm going to like that church."

WE ARE not so much concerned with the other side, but it may be worth telling, for contrast.

"When we walked into the big entrance at the other church, that same Sunday night," George went on, "everything looked lovely. There were half a dozen ushers in morning coats and silk neckties standing round, and after we stood there for what seemed fully two minutes till they decided which one would handle us, one of them came over and put us into a splendid seat. Three minutes later, just when we had gotten nicely settled down, he came along again and after explaining that that seat and two or three others were going to be used for some special purpose—just what, we couldn't understand—moved us into another pew at the side. I guess that was all right, but it looked rather queer when five minutes later, another usher came down and put some other people into the seat we had been occupying."

"That service was fine," George continued, evidently aiming to be fair. "The music was splendid, and the sermon was good. But somehow or other we went out of that church feeling sort of cold."

Was it any wonder? And is there much doubt as to which church, other things being equal, will not only "get" George and Mrs. and Miss Jordan, in its congregation, but will also be likely to "get out" of them their quota of work and support for the Cause?

Why can't more of us do it the first way?

Movement to Cut Railroad Wages Starts Controversy

PROPOSALS by railway executives for a reduction of the wages of their employees, on the ground that such action is necessary in order to avert bankruptcy for the roads, have aroused bitter opposition among the men and caused the unions to appeal to President Wilson for an inquiry into railroad finance.

After a meeting of the Association of Railway Executives in Chicago, W. W. Atterbury, vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, interjected into a hearing by the Railway Wage Board a plea for abrogation of the national agreements between the railroads and their men. He asserted that the matter could not wait and that the companies could not consider any proposal for a conference with the men, as a delay of a few days might make the whole situation chaotic. "The national agreements, rules and working conditions forced on the railroads as war conditions," Mr. Atterbury said, "cause gross waste and inefficiency. I estimate that elimination of this waste would reduce operating expenses at least $300,000,000 per annum." If this abrogation was granted, he promised that the railway executives would urge each road to make no proposals for the reduction of basic wages within ninety days, while the economies were being gauged; but he declared wage reductions must come.

The union leaders, in their appeal to the President, contended that their wages now are inadequate and that they are suffering from unemployment. They charged that the employers were taking advantage of business depression to attempt the disruption of the unions and were deceiving the public as to the real reason for the financial plight of the lines. A financial inquiry by the Interstate Commerce Commission was suggested, with a reference of the matter to Congress for such legislation as may be necessary.

The appeal charged that the "transportation system is absolutely controlled by the New York banking group centering around the house of Morgan" and that the roads have been operated inefficiently in order to discredit the government's policy and tighten the financiers' grip on them.

The railway executives, in a telegram to Mr. Wilson, denied these charges emphatically and declared the lines never had been operated more efficiently than at present. They attributed their troubles to the higher wages, placing their expenditures for labor at the rate of $3,700,000,000 during the greater part of 1920, while in 1917 they were $1,700,000,000. Higher wages, they asserted, had absorbed the entire increase in operating revenues and threatened to leave many lines practically stripped of earning power in the face of declining traffic.

Germany Fights Reparations Plan

BITTER opposition in Germany to the reparations program adopted by the Paris conference of Allied premiers halted progress toward putting the Allied plan into operation; and a conference of experts to be held in Brussels for the purpose of fixing methods of payments was postponed indefinitely because of the refusal of the German experts to participate. A general conference on the reparations issue is to open in London on February 28.

Dr. Walter Simons, German Foreign Minister, informed the Reichstag that the cabinet had authorized him to inform the Entente that its Paris program could not be considered, but that Germany would send delegates to London bearing new German proposals. The storm of protest was akin to that with which Germany greeted the Peace Treaty, and Allied observers were inclined to discount somewhat the importance of the German officials' announcements regarding the rejection of the program.

The Paris indemnity program provided that Germany should pay a total of 226,000,000,000 gold marks in forty-two annual instalments in addition to an ad valorem tax of 12 per cent. on her exports during the same period. Another clause to which the Germans objected vigorously was that forbidding Germany to contract any foreign loan without the Entente's consent—a provision aimed at Berlin's hopes of obtaining large credits in the United States. The Germans denounced this clause as a violation of the Versailles Treaty, which also had set a term of thirty years for the liquidation of Germany's debt to the Allies and carried no mention of an export tax.

Dr. Simons declared the sum demanded by the Entente was more than the whole fortune of the German people and would mean the complete economic enslavement of the nation. This assertion was denied by the London newspapers, which declared the annuities for the first five years were fixed at a figure which Germany could pay "without seriously retarding the industrial revival which is making such rapid progress." Attention was called to lavish expenditures for amusement in Germany, and Berlin's talk of chaos to follow insistence on the Allied terms was derided as an old familiar ruse to dodge just obligations.

French officials were proposing that in case Germany refuses to assent to the treaty changes made necessary by the Allied plan she should be notified

PLANNING FOR A BIG ENLARGEMENT OF BIBLE DISTRIBUTION
Bible secretaries from all over the United States and from abroad met in the Bible House, in which are the Christian Herald offices, to lay plans for a greater year's work than has ever before been attempted by the American Bible Society, which already has distributed 140,000,000 copies of the Scriptures in many lands that she owes the Reparations Commission a total of 400,000,000,000 gold marks and that the Allies would claim the right to seize the German customs and railroads to obtain payment-terms under the treaty harsher than those adopted at Paris.

Premier Briand's report of the negotiations was accepted by the French cabinet at a session presided over by President Millerand, and the Premier was assured of the support necessary for undertaking negotiations with the Germans in London. It was apparent, however, that should Briand be forced to make notable concessions in order to obtain Germany's consent to the Allied program the overthrow of his ministry would be attempted.

The United States Government has not been consulted in the negotiations over the fixing of the indemnity, and this problem will demand Mr. Harding's attention soon after he takes office.

Dry Regulations Tightened

AN IMPORTANT step toward more effective enforcement of the national prohibitory laws was taken when A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General, rendered a decision that the authority of the Internal Revenue Commissioner to issue permits for the sale in wholesale quantities of intoxicating liquors and industrial alcohol fit for beverage purposes is limited to manufacturers and wholesale druggists. This will end the activities of thousands of wholesale dealers—the Internal Revenue Bureau had a list of 3,888 affected—and will cut off a large part of the supplies which have been used in the manufacture of questionable "tonics" and which have found their way into the hands of rum-runners.

The redrafting of the Internal Revenue Bureau regulations to conform to Mr. Palmer's decision was begun at once, and the work of the enforcement officials will be centralized so that it will be easier for them to detect violations of the law.

"This decision will greatly help law enforcement," said Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League of America, "by cutting off the bootleg supply. We filed a protest against the issuance of these permits and their renewal. They never were authorized under the law. They have been a constant source of trouble in our efforts to have the law enforced."

Another move to enforce prohibition was the extension by John F. Kramer, Prohibition Commissioner, of his ban on liquor withdrawals, which has been effective in seven Eastern states. This ban was made to apply to every state, Hawaii and Porto Rico, and the fifty prohibition directors received this order: "Effective this date, approve no more applications for withdrawals of liquor. This order does not apply to alcohol nor to reasonable quantities of wine for sacramental purposes. Exception may be made in cases of retail druggists, who will not be permitted to withdraw in excess of five cases on a single withdrawal."

Recent disclosures regarding laxity of prohibition enforcement, particularly in the larger cities, have caused much concern to Federal officers, and a determination was apparent to reorganize the staffs and to devise means to make the law really effective throughout the nation.

Tariff Bill Cloture Defeated

REPUBLICAN leaders in the Senate were defeated in an effort to force the Emergency Tariff bill to an early vote, through the application of the cloture rule, a motion to shut off debate being rejected by a vote of 36 to 35, when a two-thirds majority was necessary for its adoption. Party lines were broken on the issue, nine Democrats voting for cloture and seven Republicans supporting it.

Continuation of the fight over the tariff measure threatened the success of the appropriation bills, for the Republican leaders announced that it would continue as the unfinished business and that no efforts would be spared to bring it to a vote. Senator Penrose declared the money bills might be allowed to go over to the special session and said there would be plenty of time then for the passage of appropriations, as the fiscal year does not end until June 30. Majority leaders hoped to obtain a majority in the Senate for the tariff measure, which has been passed by the House, and counted on the support of Republicans who voted against cloture. Democrats were unyielding in their opposition, terming the tariff bill a hodge-podge which would bring no benefits to the farmers it is designed to help, and refused unanimous consent to a proposal to set a date for a vote.

Mr. Harding has requested President Wilson to call a special session of the new Senate immediately after March 4, in order that prompt action may be taken on his nominations for the cabinet and other important posts. This would permit the establishment of the machinery of the new administration in advance of the convening of the special session which Mr. Harding will call early in the spring, and would enable that session to get down to business without delay.

Cabinet gossip had it that Charles G. Dawes, of Chicago, had been eliminated from consideration for Secretary of the Treasury, for which he had been a favorite, and the name of Andrew W. Mellon, of Pittsburgh, was substituted. It was said Mr. Harding intended to ask Mr. Dawes and Herbert Hoover to head important Federal commissions. Observers believed other tentative selections for the cabinet were unchanged.

The Secret of the Carved Box

A Story of the Time of Ezra, the Priest, in the Fifth Century, B. C.

By AMANDA M. HICKS

Illustrated by Brown Martin

ON THE western slope of the Mount of Olives stood a neat cottage, the home of one of the Hebrews whose people had returned to their native land when the Babylonian captivity ended.

The main room of the cottage was simply furnished, but in a niche on the wall were two objects; strange things to be found in the home of a Hebrew. One was a small stone image of the god Baal, worshiped by the Phœnicians and many adjacent peoples. Close beside this image was a beautiful cedar-wood box, covered with figures of Assyrian deities carved in relief, the great Assyrian god Ashur having central place on the tightly closed cover.

Just inside the open door of this pleasant room was Thalia, the wife and mother. With shapely arms bared to the shoulders she sat on the rug which covered the earthen floor, grasping the upright bar of the handmill on which she was grinding barley for the cakes for the evening meal. Her eyes were deep and luminous as the fishpools in Heshbon; her hair, black and straight, was held back by a dark red band, from which hung ten pieces of silver, the marriage gift of her husband.

As with practiced hand and a movement of unconscious grace she turned the upper millstone, she watched with deep content two children at play under the olive trees near by. The girl Ruth, eight years old, was dark-eyed and of slender form like the mother. The ten-year-old boy David, was like the shepherd lad of Bethlehem, ruddy of face, with clustering golden hair.

THIS humble dwelling on the western slope of the Mount of Olives overlooked the Kidron Valley, beyond which lay the city of Jerusalem, its broken-down walls enclosing desolate spaces of ruined buildings and scattered clusters of rude occupied dwellings. The one bright spot in all that dreary landscape was the temple, built by the Hebrews on their return from the Babylonian captivity, seventy-five years before.

"Ruth," called the mother, "go down the Mount and meet your father. He has gone to carry a lamb for the temple sacrifice, and will be coming home before the sun goes down."

With flying feet Ruth sped down the Mount, but soon returned alone with quivering lip. "Oh, Mother!" she cried, "father is away down there sitting on the ground with his hands over his face. Instead of lifting me to his shoulder to ride up the hill as he always does, he motioned for me to go away. What made him do that, mother?"

The wife left her grinding and hastened down the Mount, to see her husband sitting as if age had suddenly sapped his vigor, his whole frame shaking with sobbing grief.

"David, my husband, what is it?" she cried, clasping his hands in hers.

"Do not ask me, Thalia, when my answer will only bring sorrow to you and add to my own anguish."

"But, David, I must know. You have never hid anything from me. Tell me, David, what is it?"

"I will tell you, Thalia, but though it break your heart and mine, we must both be brave enough not to let the children know; not yet."

"I will be brave, David, but what can have happened?"

"TODAY in the courts of the temple," he replied, "the new teacher Ezra, the Priest, of whom I have told you, read from a roll which he says is the to put away all the alien wives and such as are born of them."

"And, Thalia, it has been decreed by Ezra and the chief men of my people that in all this land Palestine every wife who is not of Hebrew stock must return to her father's house, and that the children must go with the mother."

Half dazed Thalia said slowly: "But, David, I am not of Hebrew blood. Does this mean that I must leave you and return to my father's house?"

"Yes, Thalia, that is the meaning of the decree."

"But, David," she answered almost fiercely, "I can not send me away. When the great King Nebuchadnezzar sent the colony of my people from the Upper Zab to occupy this land, his overseer gave by writing, this house and olive grove and oil press to the men of my ancestral line, and it comes down through me to my son, for I am the only child of my father."

"I would we might know that this claim could hold," David replied sadly, "the older claim goes back to time when my people came out of Egypt and this land was divided by lot to the twelve tribes of Israel. You, as an alien, can have no inheritance in this land."

"I said I would be brave for the sake of the children," she answered, "but tell me, what must this cruel decree be executed?"

"It is now the first day of the tenth month and the alien wives must be put away by the end of the twelfth month," he said slowly.

THE coming of the children put an end to this conversation, and with such good cheer the parents could assume the evening was passed. Only when the children slept and the father and mother were out under the sky was expression given to the sorrow. When the first fierce storm of grief had passed, Thalia was first to speak.

"David, do you remember the day when we first saw each other?"

"Yes Thalia, I remember it well. It was soon after my twelfth birthday, and I had gone for the first time to the great Passover feast at the temple. The odor of sweet incense filled all the air and I almost believed I was in heaven. Then I came up the Mount, my boy's heart thrilled with new joy, and saw you sitting on the ground under the olive trees with a little hurt bird on your lap. You looked up at me and your eyes, half blinded with tears, shone like stars."

"Yes," said Thalia, "and you came and took the little bird so tenderly and looked at its wings to see if it could be made whole. Then I knew that you had a kind heart. You told me that your name was David, and that your father tended a vineyard on the side of the Mount toward Bethany. I knew you were of the Hebrew people because you had been to their temple and had the odor of incense on your garments. And, David, when I looked at you I thought you must be like the hero of your people whose name you bore."

"And, when I looked at you, Thalia, I thought 'There are no Hebrew maidens like this little alien girl with her deep dark eyes and her beautiful face.' But you were so shy that for a long time I did not see you again."

"Yes," she made reply, "I told my mother that I had talked with a Hebrew boy and that he had been sorry for my poor bird. He said: 'Thalia, it is my command that you do not again have talk with the Hebrew boy. These Hebrews are not our equals. They were long ago slaves in Egypt and in later days they have been captives in Babylon. Now they have come here to take away from us our olive orchards and vineyards which were given to us under the great King Nebuchadnezzar.' So great was my mother's displeasure that I did not see you again until the day when you drove off the dog that was holding me by the dress and snarling at me so fiercely. Mother saw you then and was so pleased with you."

In a long, unbroken silence they walked under the stars book of the law of Jehovah, given to Moses ages ago. A great company of people, both men and women, had assembled to hear the reading, and this is the word he read: 'When ye come into the land which ye go to possess, give not your daughters in marriage to the sons of the people of the land, neither take ye their daughters to your sons for wives.' That is the law of old."

"When Ezra had finished the reading there was great sorrow and weeping among the people. Then Shecaniah, one of the sons of Jehiel, said to Ezra: 'We have sinned in that we have taken strange wives of the people of the land. Now let us make a covenant grave looks that she never after objected to our friendship. You know, David, it was those years of joyous young life together that led to our marriage and that makes it so hard to part now."

"Yes," said David, "and add to those beautiful years the twelve more since you have been my wife, Thalia. How proud and happy we were when our little boy came to us. You said, 'We will call him David for his father and the great hero David of long ago.' When our little girl was born I would have called her Thalia, for you, my beloved, but you said, 'Call her Ruth,' for you knew of a great woman among my people whose name was Ruth, and I let you have your way."

So the talk went on until far into the night.

TWO months of respite hurried by, bringing with cruel swiftness the fateful day. Almost daily one or the other had said, "Today we must tell the children." But always the other had made answer: "Not today. Let them have one more day of joyous life."

The last day of the eleventh month had now come. On the morrow Thalia and the boy and girl must go out from home, never to return. Still the children had not been told. "Let them have a last night of happy sleep under the home-roof," the mother had pleaded.

When the children slept the father and mother went out to walk for the last time hand in hand under the olive trees; but first, with lighted lamp, they stood in mute agony by the bed of the sleeping children—Ruth, so like her mother, and David, with his golden hair, his ruddy face and sturdy limbs, the image not only of the shepherd lad, David, but of his father.

In a long unbroken silence they walked under the stars, then seated themselves on a low broad bench outside the door. Worn with heartache and watching, Thalia's eyes drooped, and like a tired child, she lay in David's strong arms, asleep.

With the light touch of rose petals falling in still air he kissed her again and again.

"O, God of my fathers," he prayed, "God of Abraham, of Moses and Elijah! O, Jehovah, God of heaven, who hast brought my people from the rivers of Babylon and planted them again in their own land, can Thou not help us? Is there no way? O, Jehovah, if there is no way but that my precious ones must go from me on the morrow, smite, I pray Thee, this dwelling with plague, and let us all die together before the morning dawns, O, Jehovah, God of my fathers!"

UNCONSCIOUSLY, in his agony, he uttered these last words aloud and Thalia stirred in his arms. Looking down he saw by the light of the coming dawn her face radiant with a smile.

"O, David," she said, "I have dreamed such a wonderful dream, and the pain is all gone from my heart. You know, David, the beautiful carved cedar-wood box that has always stood in the wall niche beside the image of my god, Baal. Often we have wondered what is in it and you must remember well what I have told you concerning the box and why I have never opened it. For a long long time it has been in our family, always the sacred charge of the eldest son. There is a legend that a curse would fall on any other than an eldest son of the line who should open the box and that a curse would fall on him should he reveal the contents of the box.

"As my father had no son and I am his only child, the box fell to me. I have never opened it because I feared the curse. In my dream I said to you, 'David, before I go out from house and home never to return I must know what is in that box. I no longer fear the curse, for nothing can come to us now more dreadful than has already come.' You brought the box and still half afraid, we lifted the beautifully carved lid. We stood amazed to see the box full of shining pieces of gold, hundreds of them. We know, David, that a million shining pieces of gold could not make us glad this night, but when you saw the glittering pieces you laughed aloud and held me in your arms so close that I cried out.

"Then you lifted Ruth, and tossed her as you used to lift and toss her when a baby. Then you caught up David and laughed and cried all at the same time. You have not laughed for two months, David, and it was good to hear you laugh once more, if only in a dream. Go now and bring the box and we will open it, for in truth I no longer fear the curse."

A Woman Who Saves Lives

DR. IDA M. SANBORN has maintained a small corner for a good many years in an office building in Chicago. And from its cozy depths she has dispensed comfort and good cheer and hope to the stricken ones who have sought her out. I say sought her out advisedly, for—like many another splendid physician—she has a genuine horror of appearing to foist her services upon the public.

Dr. Sanborn is a large, motherly woman. She is the sort of a woman who even looks comforting—whose warm, friendly hands seem always outstretched to others. As one of her patients said to a friend:

"Dr. Sanborn is not a bit awe-inspiring, like other doctors. There's something about her that makes you want to take her into your confidence. There's something about her that makes you want to rest your head upon her shoulder—and your troubles on her heart!"

During the long years of her practice, comparatively few have known of Dr. Sanborn. She has gone quietly on in her unassuming way; working tirelessly, and gladly, and often without recompense—for many of her patients were too poor to pay for the services she so willingly gave.

IT WAS quite by chance that her name leaped into prominence; quite against her own volition—almost without her consent. She might never have been discovered by the general public if a friend of one Charles Sumner Harmon—a prominent Chicago lawyer—had not played the part of Fate.

The friend—who shall be nameless, as are most people who play the part of Fate—came into Chicago's University Club one day and nearly fell over Mr. Harmon, who was sitting disconsolately in a large chair by a window. Mr. Harmon was looking pale, thin, and—worst of all—discouraged. And the friend noticed it; couldn't help noticing it!

"What's the matter, old chap?" he questioned, "aren't things going right? What's the matter?"

Mr. Harmon did not raise his eyes to his friend's face. He didn't seem to have enough energy to raise his eyes.

"Everything's the matter," he answered at last, and wearily, "Everything's the matter!"

The friend dropped down into a chair beside the stricken man.

"You're ill," he said; and then, "Tell me all about it."

Mr. Harmon still sat with downcast eyes.

"I've got diabetes," he said finally, in his curiously lack-luster voice; "I'm dying, I guess. I might just as well die as live—the way I'm living! I can't eat or sleep properly—I can't work or take any exercise. . . ."

TO YOU who have never suffered with diabetes—to you who have never seen a loved one suffer—Mr. Harmon's statement wouldn't sound utterly hopeless. But to folk who have seen the dread and apparently incurable disease at work, there need be no explanation. They will know that diabetes is a disease that vitally affects all parts of the body—they will know that it undermines the whole system, bringing with it loss of sleep, of weight, and of general strength. And they will know that the only recognized treatment, for many years, has been the most rigid form of dieting—a form of dieting that makes life very nearly unbearable to the average man or woman. And this treatment does not cure—it's only hope is to hold the disease in check!

Mr. Harmon—as he explained, later, to his friend—had suffered under the tortures of the diet. He had known the pain of the terrible swellings—one of the most advanced symptoms—the inertia and fatigue occasioned by the general drag of the disease. When the friend, out of a clear sky, suggested that he go to a doctor who was quite unknown to him—and who was, crowning indignity, a woman doctor—he was prone to be amazed, and slightly angry.

"But I have seen physicians from all over the world," he expostulated, "specialists! I have been to exercise, to gain new strength and courage. And at the end of nine months he was entirely well.

It was when he was nearing the end of Dr. Sanborn's course of treatment that Mr. Harmon began to wonder why she had never become famous because of her remarkable powers—why she had never tried to exploit her work. It troubled his legal mind. But when he questioned her he came sharply up against the black wall of professional reticence, a wall that seems to surround all physicians.

"I could not advertise or get publicity in any way," she told him. "It is unethical. A doctor can not encourage—trade. Doctors must wait for patients to come to them. For twenty years I have been specializing in Bright's disease and diabetes, but only the people who have been sent to me, by satisfied patients, have been able to benefit by my experience and study."

MR. HARMON went away from her office in a disturbed frame of mind. It worried him—just as it would worry any one so deeply interested—to feel that this woman was keeping a great gift from the world.

"Why," he argued to himself, "is it unethical for a physician to tell folk what he can do? Why? Why?"

When one stops to think of it, it is a silly idea—this idea of professional silence. No other trade—that I can at the moment remember—cherishes such an idea. Your poet gives his work to the world—the artist and the musician make humanity better with their color and harmony. But the physician—who has the gift of life to give—is often held back from the giving of it by the question of ethics. Is it right?

I think not. And Mr. Harmon thought not. And because he thought not, very sincerely, he continued to urge. He did not believe that it was right even for him, a mere layman, to let other people suffer and die, without an effort, when he had been so helped. Still less did he think that anything could justify the staying of Dr. Sanborn's wonderful hand. He wanted the news shouted from the housetops.

And he won. Dr. Sanborn finally sent for him. She had been ill herself—desperately ill. When she faced him she was pale and weak, but a new light shone in her eyes—glorifying her kindly face. Quite without preface she began to talk, and it seemed to Mr. Harmon that the very pulsing of her heart was in her voice.

"When I lay in bed, thinking that I might die," she told him, "your arguments took on a new force—and a new meaning. I realized that I had been keeping back something that God had placed in my hands—in trust. It came to me with a sudden strong conviction that there were people, all over this country of ours, who were dying—just as you were dying when I took your case. It came to me that I would be almost wicked if I did not do more than I had ever done before, to help them. I felt, all at once, that folk must know about it. You were right—and I was wrong. My cure shall live to bless increasing thousands long after I am only a memory—it shall be given to the world—to the people who need it. Ethics are not as important as lives!"

That is why, today, Dr. Sanborn has stepped from the background, in to the light. That is why people have come to recognize her, why she has grown prominent in the medical field, why her work is becoming well and favorably known to the heads of her profession as well as to the layman.

But—despite her success—she is unchanged. She is still the friendly woman with a sensible mind—that is impervious to success—and a motherly heart and a broad, comforting shoulder that tired heads long to rest against.

DR. IDA M. SANBORN

London, to Paris, to New York. Surely if this woman could help me—if she were as good a doctor as you say—I would have heard of her!"

And yet—despite his unconcealed scorn and skepticism, Mr. Harmon finally allowed his friend to take him to see Dr. Sanborn at her little obscure office. And, after making various tests, she surprised him by telling him that she thought she could help him. "Restore" she may have said—"cure" is a word that Dr. Sanborn does not use. The treatment that she outlined was a process entirely new to him, a process not built merely upon hateful and continued dieting—a process that was constructive rather than destructive.

And so she cured him. Not in a day—not in a week, or in a month. But from the beginning Mr. Harmon was allowed to eat wholesome, nourishing food—carefully selected at first—which he had been longing for. From the outset he was permitted to ex-

The German Indemnity

AFTER a prolonged discussion, the Allied Supreme Council has approved the plan for fixing the German indemnity and announced it to the world. It provides for the payment by Germany of 226,000,000 gold marks in 42 annual instalments, on a rising scale, beginning with 2,000,000,000 marks for each of the first two years, 3,000,000,000 yearly for the third, fourth and fifth years; 4,000,000,000 yearly for the sixth, seventh and eighth years; 5,000,000,000 yearly for the ninth, tenth and eleventh years, and 6,000,000,000 yearly thereafter until the full indemnity is paid. The plan also provides for a tax of 12 per cent. on all German exports.

All of the Allied Premiers have given the plan their approval. Germany's consent is called for and should that, after full discussion, be refused, it is intimated that the Allies may hold her responsible for the 400,000,000,000 gold marks demanded by the Reparations Commission and that military force may be employed if necessary. "Conversations" between the Allied and German representatives relative to the basis of the indemnity agreement will be resumed on February 28.

As might be expected, the German press protests bitterly against the indemnity plan, and its rejection by the German Cabinet is foreshadowed, although the Allies have expressed confidence in its ultimate acceptance. Regarding the proposed tax on exports, the point is made that to put a 12 per cent. tax on all German goods sold abroad creates a difficult situation, as the Allied nations are practically in agreement that they do not want German exports. It may be, however, that this situation will be modified during the "conversations" that are to follow if the absolute rejection of the indemnity by the German Government does not precipitate a new crisis meanwhile.

It is recalled that in 1917 Kaiser William, still confident of winning the war, estimated that the Allies would have to pay to Germany an indemnity of 500,000,000,000 gold marks. Now, we have the reverse of the picture: Germany, conscious of her helplessness, and begging indulgence from the very foes she had hoped to plunder unrestrainedly. The world hardly wonders that the exile at Doorn should pass much of his time lamenting the vanishing of his "beautiful dream, all too soon finished," and mourning as he realized "how far Germany had fallen."

Developments in the next few weeks may help greatly to clear up the situation. There may be a modification of the attitude of both sides, which will subordinate all minor interests to the larger view of world peace and opportunities for rehabilitation.

Measuring the Universe

MODERN science is nothing if not bold in its adventures. Close on the heels of the astonishing calculations of Prof. Michelson, of Chicago University, concerning the immensity of Betelgeuse (one of the stars in the constellation of Orion, which with its background of immeasurable distances impresses the mind with the hopelessness of comprehending infinity), comes an even more startling statement from a Berlin scientist. According to a cable dispatch published in the New York Times of January 28, Prof. Albert Einstein in a lecture before the Academy of Science in the German capital made the startling claim that the entire universe is capable of being measured. His theory is that by applying what is known as the "relativity theory" to the Newtonian law of reckoning the average velocity of stars it can be demonstrated that real gravitations at vast distances are smaller than the distances demanded by Newton law. In this manner he claimed that such divergencies would show the finite character of the universe, and would even permit its size to be estimated.

This is by far the boldest flight ever attempted by any scientist. It has startled the astronomers of the world, and we may expect to hear of other attempts to measure the infinite. Within the last half century astronomy has made great advances and added much to man's knowledge of the heavens. We may be on the borderland of still greater discoveries; yet we must not forget that astronomy itself, relatively speaking, is a speculative science. We are all merely learners in nature's great School of Knowledge, and much that we learn has to be unlearned later.

Dr. Einstein has shown a love of sensation in some of his previous researches; hence we need not be surprised to find the same tendency in announcing his latest discovery. It is evidently his belief that the average velocity of the stars is fixed "as that which they must have to prevent the Milky Way from collapsing on itself through reciprocal action." In other words the procession has to be kept up at full speed, otherwise it is liable to telescope itself, with what terrific results Dr. Einstein himself evidently hesitates to conjecture.

As might have been expected the theories of the Berlin professor find an echo in some of our own universities. Dr. Eisenhart, professor of mathematics in Princeton, who has been applying Einstein's methods, announces as the result of his calculations that the radius of the universe "might be said to be about one million times ten million times the distance from the earth to the sun." He candidly admits that this is inconceivable to the mind, but adds, by way of consolation, that it is "easily demonstrable by means of mathematics."

It would be well for those who study the stars to carry into their occupation the sentiment of reverence. Human knowledge is a very little thing set by the side of Omniscience. It was Dr. Young, himself a devoted student of the heavens, who first expressed the conviction that "an undevout astronomer is mad."

Our Palestine Orphans

IN PAST years thousands of readers of the Christian Herald have taken up, as a very special and delightful kind of missionary work, the training of little homeless and helpless orphans in India, China, Africa and other countries. Many have kept up this contact until the present day, and find it a source of joy and heart satisfaction. They feel that they have been chosen as the means through which these young lives are being developed on Christian lines.

In presenting our appeal (in the Christian Herald of January 29) in behalf of the little orphan maids of Palestine, now sheltered in the Christian Herald Orphanage there, we entertain the hope that all of the thirty-six will be "spoken for" by kind American patrons. Where any reader does not feel that he or she can assume, unaided, the entire burden, friends should be interested who are willing to share in it.

One important thing we would suggest here: Any reader who desires to take one of these little ones for support, should make two, or even three or more selections from the list which we published in a recent issue, as it is not improbable that some of those chosen by our friends may have been taken already by other patrons.

Fight the Bad Movies!

IT IS the duty of every good citizen, and especially of all thoughtful men and women who have the moral welfare of the young folks at heart, to aid the movement in behalf of clean films in the motion pictures. Many large film concerns, of their own accord, have pledged themselves to assist in this wholesome reform. Now, it is up to the citizens to enter a protest, when they discover any film in a "movie" theater that is an offense against morals or good taste. The Church already has put itself on record against the presentation of objectionable films, but that is not enough; the people themselves in every community should do their part.

In localities where there is no board of censors, public-spirited citizens should themselves do the work of such a board, by protesting against the use of any film which they know to be debasing and objectionable, especially to young and susceptible minds. If their protest goes unheeded, then let them write to the Christian Herald, stating briefly the basis of their objections, and also the name of the producing firm that issues the film to which they object.

In spite, however, of the offers of the film companies to cooperate with the good element, and also with the Christian Herald, in the crusade for better movies, we are compelled to record the fact that there are occasional slips on their part which appear to us to be inexcusable. Whether this comes from a relaxation of vigilance or from a direct purpose to cater to the vulgar element for pecuniary gains need not be discussed now. That such an attitude should be possible at all in view of the pledges given is the outstanding fact which speaks for itself. We must have a distinct and clear understanding on this subject. The companies have themselves given assurance of the desire to produce or encourage only unobjectionable films. They must be held to that pledge. Nothing less than clean, wholesome, moral entertainment will be satisfactory to the American people who, in the larger sense are, we believe, in favor of law, order and public decency. And the sooner all the film corporations recognize this fact, the better for all concerned.

An Apology and an Invitation

WE HAVE been moving: not the Christian Herald, but our Subscription Department; and some of our regular "chores" have suffered sadly because of the confusion that always accompanies a transfer of equipment from place to place.

Among the duties neglected was our monthly notices of expiration, which should always reach those of our friends whose subscriptions are expiring, at least a month in advance.

Thus, those of you who should have received notice in January that your time for renewing was at hand, have not yet had your notices.

Now, will you accept our apologies, and at the same time, heap coals of fire on our heads by sending in (those of you who would naturally renew now) your renewals before the notices get to you—and within the next few days?

By such favor you will save us from the results of our own involuntary neglect.

Thank you!

The Tax Puzzle

SCENE between the Tax Assessor, and Old Man Ultimate Consumer.

Tax Assessor (after some minutes of interview). "And now we come to your library. What is its value?"

Ultimate Consumer. "Do you mean what I paid for the books when I bought them, what I could get for them at a sale, or what they are worth to me?"

T. A. "What is your library worth?"

U. C. "You are a sworn officer of the state. I ask you what does the state mean when it asks me under oath to declare what my library is worth? Just what does it mean?"

T. A. "Why—er, it means what do you value it at?"

U. C. "Honestly, I cannot answer the state. There are books on my shelves that contain autographs from famous people that I would not sell for any amount of money. There are other books that have sentiment and memories clustering about them. I—"

T. A. "The state cares nothing about all that. What is your library worth?"

U. C. "Honestly I don't know. And it looks as if the state could not tell me."

T. A. "How would $100 cover it? And you are allowed $50 exemption, you know."

U. C. "$100 would certainly cover it. Do you think I could get that much on a forced sale?"

T. A. (putting down on his sheet $100). "Now how about your piano? How much is it worth?"

U. C. "Do you mean what it cost when new, what we could get for it if we advertised it, or what we hold it at?"

T. A. "I mean what is it worth."

U. C. "Exactly. Well, it was a gift from my wife's father. Of course now you know how much we value it at."

T. A. "Say $150?"

U. C. "At least that much for tender association."

T. A. (after putting down $150). "And now how about household goods? Silver, furniture, heirlooms, art pieces, pictures, keepsakes? How much do you value them at?"

U. C. "Do you mean what we paid for them or what our friends paid, what we could get for them at auction?"

T. A. (doggedly). "What are they worth?"

U. C. "Wait a minute. Among the furniture is the old-fashioned rocking-chair in which my wife rocked to sleep our first baby. It alone ought to be worth at least $100,000. I wouldn't take that for it. And yet, I am sure it wouldn't bring $1 in the market."

T. A. "How much—"

U. C. "You are an officer of the state. Tell me what the rocking-chair is worth to the state?"

T. A. (writing). "Call it $200. Is that about right?"

U. C. "Who knows? Yea, verily, who knows? What a farce the whole tax business has always been."

The Library as an Open Door

How It Helps Transform the Alien into a Good American

By KATHERINE LOUISE SMITH

AMONG the important things that war has taught us is that we have a great body of people—about five and a half millions—who can not read or write the language of our country. More remarkable still a large number of these are native born. It came as a shock to discover that there were tens of thousands of men in camps who could not speak the language of the country they were called upon to defend, and we were in some cases obliged to teach them enough English to understand the commands of the officers.

It is a great experiment that we have been trying in the United States. The gathering together and merging into one people of different races, creeds and aspirations must be undertaken with sympathy, understanding and education. Possibly sympathy is the most valuable, for it is sympathy for the foreign-born that leads to understanding and education. If we are to help others to become good citizens we must broaden ourselves, be less insular, appreciate the trials of others and realize Americanization in our homes and families; we must look upon Americanization as "The constant searching of the human heart for the thing that is better." We can not expect people to pattern after us unless we, too, improve.

Long before the war New York City, because the gateway of the nation, became interested in the problem of the immigrant, took up the question of teaching foreigners, both literate and illiterate, and of having special classes in day and night schools. Today this same work is being accomplished in some form or other in nearly all of the states, and we are beginning to learn the desirability of fashioning a new bond.

An important agency for the furtherance of this great work is the public library, which stands ready to welcome the stranger who is feeling lonely in a new country. Some six hundred American libraries are interested in Americanization, and efforts are made to answer questions intelligently, to give advice and to make a library a constructive force for bewildered immigrants. A few years ago people wondered that our public libraries contained books of foreign languages. Today the public library is such an important factor that the Department of the Interior in its campaign to increase school attendance among non-English-speaking people issues a list of suggestions on "How Libraries Can Help." Many of these hints have been universally adopted, but every library feels it must use its own methods to meet individual needs.

OPPORTUNITIES differ in localities, and results must of necessity vary, but most libraries issue lists of books which are of help to the immigrant. Classified under the general head of Americanization may be found lessons in English readers for evening schools, language lessons, pronouncing spellers in English, Bohemian, Hungarian, Italian and other languages, with special emphasis laid on the English versions. There are books on citizenship, civic readers for new Americans, and books on how we are governed and how to become a citizen.

The libraries most interested in helping the alien feel that it is a requisite to keep well supplied with books written in foreign languages, for the immigrant likes to read his own tongue as well as learn the English language. In most of our large cities there are sections so foreign that it seems difficult to realize they are a part of America, and in such localities the branch public library finds a welcome place and becomes an important factor.

From New York City, with its forty-three or more branch libraries, to the small libraries in the range towns of Lake Superior in which are found Hollanders, Bulgarians, Montenegrins, French, Norwegians, Belgians, Germans, Swiss, Finns, Russians, Swedes, Danes, and other nationalities, ingenious and in most cases successful experiments are being carried on in the effort to help newcomers to understand American brotherhood and what democracy means. Tact is a powerful aid in winning new Americans. In the words of a student of the subject: "We can not take these new people by the nose and say, 'Here, become Americans.'" We must remember that other countries have their traditions, customs and mannerisms, and it is possible that some of them are as good or better than ours. Certainly no man will become a good American citizen unless he was a good citizen in the land from whence he came.

Instances without number can be quoted of the astounding way in which sometimes the tables are turned and the American instead of the foreigners becomes the learner. Take, for an example, the Easter day that the white-aproned Greek clerk in a Greek candy store offered to take the writer to his Greek minister to secure data on observances of Easter Sunday in Jerusalem. On the way this vendor of candy, who stood all day weighing sweets by the pound and rubbing and turning apples so the best side of the fruit would appeal to the public, looked at me questioningly. Then, "You are a writer?" he asked, and as he drew himself up with pride he added, "I am a graduate of a college in Athens." I had started with a candy vendor and now there arose before me a vision of Athens in its learning and splendor, and I did not wonder at the pride in his tone. This is only one of countless examples of foreigners, educated, in their own lands, who are working in any capacity in this country in order to learn the ways and language that in the end they may become sons of America.

OVER five hundred libraries are interested in keeping in touch with new methods of naturalization. Many of these libraries, especially in large cities, are employing novel means to become acquainted with the foreigner. Certain ones, notably New York, Cleveland, Detroit and Minneapolis, stand out promi-nently in the movement of dealing with unassimilated races from all parts of the world. Some cities have cosmopolitan neighborhoods where all races meet and do not mingle. There are other sections given over to one nationality alone, such as the Bohemian section, the Serbian section, and others. New York City has such sections which contain more inhabitants than some of the large cities of Europe. No wonder the librarian in any one of these districts feels bewildered to know where to begin, and becomes intensely interested as the work progresses.

These small foreign settlements—part of New York's coronet—are the exact places where it is desirable that Americanism should grow rapidly. But the people must be approached tactfully. Sometimes this is accomplished by devoting a complete department in the library catering to a certain district to the language of the people living in that locality. The Webster branch of the New York Library may be taken as an example, for here there is a collection of some eight thousand Bohemian books, with a native Bohemian woman in charge. Exhibits of Bohemian pictures and handicrafts show the people of that intelligent race that in this library they are more than welcome and that here they have friends and a home which is intended to endear them to New York and America.

A somewhat similar method is carried out in the Tompkins Square branch where a Hungarian librarian is in charge who, so far as possible, meets every Hungarian entering the library and introduces him to large collections of Hungarian literature placed on the shelves. Italians in particular grow fond of a library after they become acquainted with its resources. While they like the ideal and picturesque, they also call for works on agriculture, bibliography, and popular novels.

IT BECOMES more and more apparent that the work among women is of vital importance if the family is to become Americanized. Time was when the effort was directed almost exclusively toward the foreign man, but as women become independent wage-earners they want to exercise their right to independence, and it is desirable that women become Americanized now that they have the vote. Then, too, the children who speak English are prone to look down on the limitation of the mother, and this is another reason why the foreign woman should learn to speak our language. Some libraries keep trace of men who take out citizenship papers, and as soon as they are issued present the man with an invitation to make use of the library.

Because a woman can most successfully break through the reserve of the immigrant's home and can meet these women of foreign birth and urge them to study English, many times the librarians make home visits where the children act as interpreters. Sometimes the librarian becomes a sort of safety valve, or confessor, and there are times that all the women in the neighborhood congregate to learn why a strange lady is talking.

Cleveland has done much of this work tactfully and successfully. It has been found effective to leave a supply of circulars and placards at the neighborhood store. Invitations urging people to come and get a book are often accepted with pleasure and librarians visit the night schools where hundreds are studying. Cleveland and some other libraries have collections of "Books for Beginners in English," cook books, the Bible, technical books, histories, works on science and kindred subjects. These are called for in the language of the reader at first, but gradually as he becomes familiar with our language the foreigner prefers them in English.

In New York the Italian circulation increased twenty-seven per cent. in two years largely through the success

The Day of Miracles

TEXT—Josh. 10:19. "And there was no day like that day before or after it."

WHY so? What was it that made that particular day stand up above other days like an Alp among the foothills? It was because the Arm of the Lord was miraculously made bare that day. The five kings of Canaan had come out against Israel and were being discomfited—but the sun was going down! More time was needed for the completing of the victory. "Then spake Joshua unto the Lord (More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of!) and behold the sun stood still on Gibeon until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies."

A miracle? Aye, even so; a miracle. And what will you do with it? Come, scientists and philosophers, and let us explain it away. Call it an eclipse or an adumbration of the heavens above the valley of Ajalon. Farewell, the miracle! But what have you done? In getting rid of the Arm of the Lord made bare to help His people on their knees, you have simply reduced that wonderful day to the common level of other days.

But this is ancient history; it happened three thousand years ago. Let us bring the narrative up to date. What is the matter with today? Shall today be recorded as a red-letter day, of which some of us shall have reason to say hereafter, "There was no day like that day before or after it"?

That depends upon us. Today will join the long procession of commonplace days that, ever since our birth, have been treading upon each other's heels on their weary march toward the Great Day, unless like Joshua we "speak unto the Lord" and call for miracles. For whatever men may say, the word of the Lord is clear; the day of miracles has not gone by.

SOME miracles are exclusively divine, inasmuch that we have no part in them. Life, for example. "In Him we live and move and have our being." Our physical life is merely a succession of breaths. The other day a group of scientists at Johns Hopkins University were amazed beyond measure on discovering a man who could accelerate the beating of his pulse at will. But why wonder at that? I can quicken my pulse, and so can you, by merely glancing at a moving-picture of a suffering child. But suppose those learned professors were to find a man who could at will breathe once after he had "breathed his last"—that would be a wonder!

The fact is that every breath I breathe is a miracle; and every succeeding breath is as marvelous as a resurrection from the dead. In God we live so really that every breath we draw is a new creation of His.

What then of immortality? That also is a ubiquitous miracle. Every springing bud behind the falling leaves of autumn proclaims it. Mr. Edison has just announced that, so far as he can make out from the scientific point of view, immortality is nothing but a dream. Precisely so. Science, with its use of the five physical senses, can follow a man up a blind alley of life until it faces the mystery called Death and there—for want of further evidence—it is obliged to pause with the pronouncement, "Death ends all!" But faith penetrates the mystery with its "evidence of things not seen" and cries triumphantly, "I shall live and not die!"

The most distinguished scientist of his time was Michael Faraday, of whom it is related that once, on a journey through the Alps, he came upon the lonely grave of a tourist who had perished in a snowfall. "Dead," he sighed, "dead forever!" Then, catching sight of a torn cocoon clinging to the wooden cross, his faith—like John outrunning Peter to the empty tomb in Joseph's garden—outran the dull materialism of his science to salute the miracle of life and immortality!

To life and immortality we must needs add Providence, as one of the divine miracles with which every passing day is crowded to the brim. In our morning prayer, when like Joshua we speak with the Lord, we say, "Give us this day our daily bread." And, finding us in the bread line, behold, how the Lord giveth us our meat in due season.

"Nay," replies the godless man, "I earn my bread by the sweat of my brow." So be it. Go out into the field and plant a grain of wheat and make it grow by the sweat of your brow. Sweat blood, if you please, and you will sweat in vain unless God makes bare His Arm. The light of the sun, the fructifying factors of the soil, the early and the latter rains are all from Him. Let Him withhold even His drops of dew, and the famine-stricken would plead with shrivelled hands in vain.

WANTED: a miracle! Lift up your eyes and see! Every spear of wheat that rises from its silent grave in the dry and parched field is a new creation—as distinctly a miracle, and therefore as far beyond the purview of science, as the standing still of the sun on Gibeon.

All this of Providence, but what of Grace? We are living under the shadow of the Cross; and there never was a miracle like that. It matters not whether you have heeded the outstretched hands of incarnate Love or not: there hangs the Christ of God!

If the sun were suddenly to descend from mid-heaven and assume the dimensions of a glow-worm, and if that glow-worm's spark of light were to expand until its radiance covered the uttermost parts of the earth, that would be as nothing in comparison with the Love that stooped from the throne of heaven to the anguish of Calvary for us. Explain it who can! This is "the love of God that passeth knowledge." In it behold the miracle of all miracles; God's own miracle, wrought without us, yet yielding all its benefits to the most ill-deserving on the sole condi-

3:11-15.) By his acceptance of Christ he is assured of deliverance from the penalty of sin; but from the hour of his conversion he is expected to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." It is by this building up of character that he attains to the "fulness of the measure of the stature of a man"; that is, of a Christian, "the highest style of man." To this end the Holy Spirit—who is so called because his official function is to make men holy—invites us to co-operate with him. Thus it is written, "Work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you to will and to do of His own good pleasure." By this we are given to understand that the "good pleasure" of God is to develop the largest possibilities that are in us.

And still another of the co-operative miracles is Efficiency. The passive graces do not constitute the whole of Christian character. The yoke of Christ must be reckoned with. There are yokes many and heavy which must patiently be borne in the course of natural life; but the yoke of Christ means co-operation with Him in the building up of His Kingdom on earth. His yoke is always for two. A true Christian is never alone in the discharge of duty; it is always, "My Lord and I." This is the secret of an earnest Christian life: but whether you and I shall ever realize it depends on our assuming His yoke. In this life we are serving an apprenticeship for the life further on; learning how to do things for Him. To stand with folded hands, dreaming dreams and seeing visions, while the fields are white unto the harvest, is to fall infinitely short of our high calling and of the splendid opportunities of life.

There is another miracle going on today—the greatest of all, to wit, the Conquest of the World for Christ—which is no miracle of ours unless we choose to have part in it. Our Lord intended that His Church should be a mobilized army for the propagation of His Gospel here and there and everywhere until every knee should bow before Him. If, after the lapse of nineteen long centuries, the triumph is still apparently afar off, it is because there are so many camp-followers. If every Christian were in the rank and file we should soon be crying, "The Lord is come!" The remedy for this condition of things is not in complaining of the Church, but in adjusting ourselves to the divine call. Are we, you and I, co-operating with the Captain of our salvation in the winning of souls? "The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves that we are underlings." If we as avowed Christians have hitherto been laggards, let us make this day memorable by falling into line and keeping step with the militant host.

IT IS for us to say what sort of a day this shall be. One thing is sure: it hastens to a close. The hands on God's dial will not turn back for us. But—as Napoleon said to Marshal Ney one afternoon when the battle was going against him—"There's time enough yet!" Aye, there is time enough yet in this short day for sinners to accept Christ, time enough for Christians to redeem the past, time enough for every one of us to co-operate with the Lord and His people in the winning of the world for truth and righteousness! But there is no time to lose.

The day is short; yet the shortest of days is interminably long when measured by the shadow it casts. "The evil a man does lives after him," says Shakespeare. Right so far; but all wrong when he adds, "the good is oft interred with his bones." In the recent excavations among the ruins of Nineveh an unpaid wine-bill was discovered, the abiding record of an ancient debauch; and close beside it a child's amulet, the memorial of a mother's love. The good and evil of our lives alike live after us. Wherefore, let us take heed how we order our lives today and every day.

For—one more word—this may be our last day. But what of that? "Wherefore look ye so sadly to-day?" asked Joseph of the chief butler in prison; "within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thy head and restore thee to thy place."

Suppose the sun of this world should never rise again for us, all's well if the dawn of tomorrow find us sweeping through the gates of heaven to larger tasks and more enduring joys in the presence of the Lord who has redeemed us.

If we would live for eternity, therefore, let us live today. "Do noble things, not dream them, all day long; and so make life, death and the vast forever one grand sweet song."

Then, looking back to this day, we shall be able to say, "There was no day like that day, before or after it."

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Jesus, the Very Thought of Thee," or "Jerusalem My Happy Home."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Isa. 53:1-12.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (See page 151, first column.)

Sermon—"THE DAY OF MIRACLES"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Hark! Hark! My Soul; Angelic Songs are Swelling," or "Jesus Shall Reign Where'er the Sun."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud. Eternal Father, Creator of the worlds and Lover of little children; Thou Who holdest the Universe in the hollow of Thy hand and notest the sparrow's fall, grant us, as we depart, the cheering thought that we are not of small importance in Thy sight, but that Thou hast taken account of us in our needs. Into the place of peace and contentment may we go with this thought of Thee and ourselves. In Jesus' Name we ask it. AMEN.

tion of acceptance! "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?"

These are some of the divine miracles. But they are so familiar that we keep on breathing, and eating our daily bread, with an occasional glance at the Cross, as if such miracles were a matter of course.

But there are other miracles which may be called co-operative, because, while wrought by God alone, they are conditioned on our participation with Him.

One of them is Salvation. All men are made salvable by the atonement of Christ who "tasted death for every man"; but only those are saved who accept Him as their Saviour. How then is salvation called "free"? It is free as air or sunlight or spring water, which are likewise gifts of God; but air must be breathed, and light is unavailing for eyes closed against it, and a river of water would not quench the thirst of a man who refused to drink it. Wherefore it is written, "Today if ye will hear His voice!"

It may be that some non-Christian is reading these words just now; if so let him know that nothing but that "if" stands between him and the glory of the endless life. Were he to say with his whole heart, "I will"—clasping the hand outstretched from the Cross—the miracle would straightway be wrought, because "there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." But otherwise the day will close without it.

ANOTHER of the co-operative miracles is Sanctification. A sinner may be saved "so as by fire" or "with an abundant salvation." (Read 1 Cor.

Love without Sight

SUNDAY. I Pet. 1:8. "Whom not having seen ye love." We sometimes speak of "love at first sight." Two lives are brought together, and there is a recognition that is filled with far-off destinies. "Deep calleth unto deep." The affinities leap into spiritual wedlock. Each knows the other as life's complement, and the hearts embrace in hallowed union. The fair vision came, and its gentle impression awoke the sleeping love and stirred it into fervent and vigilant life. It was "love at first sight."

But love is not always aroused by the first sight. The "first sight" may not stir the heart to even a languid interest. The vision may be as unimportant as a cipher. Or the "first sight" may create a repulsion. It may excite my dislike. It may rather rouse the critic than wake the lover. But love that remains sleeping at the "first sight" may be aroused by more intimate communion. The ministries of the spirit may triumph, where the allurements of the countenance failed. Love may be born, not of sight, but of fellowship. It may spring into being amid the intimacies of a deepening companionship.

A number of young people are thrown together in frequent fellowship. For months, and perhaps for years, their association does not pass beyond the sphere of friendship. But one day the fellowship of two of them opened into intimacy, and the sober servant, friendship, made way for the master passion, love. They had seen each other's faces for years, and they remained companions; they caught a glimpse of each other's hearts, and they were transformed into lovers. So love may be the child of spiritual intimacy. It may wait on knowledge. It may wake into being through the ministry of a deep communion.

"Whom not having seen ye love." Theirs was not the love born of gazing upon Christ's face, but the love begotten by communion with His heart. Love may be born of spiritual fellowship. If only we can get into intimacy with the Master's spirit, love may wake into being and song. It is just for this opportunity of individual communion that the Master is craving. He has little fear of our not falling in love with Him, if we will only listen to His story. He wants to visit the heart and whisper His evangel to the secret place.

"If any man will open the door, I will come in and sup with him." That is what He asks—an open door. He asks to be allowed to visit the soul, to pay His attentions, to declare His aims and purposes, and to whisper the Gospel of His own unsearchable love.

The Righteous Calm Amid the Storm

MONDAY. Psa. 92:12. "The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree." As the palm stands before the sirocco, swaying and bending but ever righting itself, so the righteous man, in the midst of controversies on every side, rests, as they say, "in the eye of the storm." He has duly considered the problems of faith in the light of Revelation and has arrived at conclusions which are proof against the transitory fashions and opinions of the world. He has marked out his course at the bidding of his Master and the shouting of the crowd cannot swerve him. He has committed his soul to the guidance of One who makes no mistakes and is therefore able to say, "I know whom I have believed and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day!"

He has no armor of his own, but being panoplied in the whole armor of God—girdle of truth, breastplate of righteousness, sandals of the preparation of the Gospel, shield of faith, helmet of salvation and sword of the Spirit—he is able to withstand in the evil day, and, having done all, to stand.

In no spirit of bravado but of humble dependence on the Omnipotence by which he is thus buttressed, he plants himself upon his convictions, saying, "Here I stand; I cannot otherwise; God help me!"

The Manifestation of Refinement

TUESDAY. Mat. 3:2, 3. "He is like a refiner's fire—and He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and He shall purify the sons of Levi and purge them as gold and silver." The word "refinement" has fallen on evil ways. It has been robbed of its finer meaning through many years and, like the tramp of the highway, it needs to be reclothed in its original, purple and fine linen. Refinement is not learned at Harvard or Vassar, nor is it borrowed from fashionable society; nor does it come with wealth. True aristocracy is a thing of the heart; culture and refinement are born of sympathy, purity and constancy of character.

It is not human nature to be sincere. Human nature is carnal, proud and selfish. Humility is not a trait of the natural human heart. The only humility known to the worldly man is the humility that is proud of its humility. It is not human nature within us that bends our sympathies and drains our compassion, as we witness the need and sorrow of men. Human nature does not minister; it lives to be ministered to. The dross that Christ comes to refine out of us is simply our fallen human nature. When He is through with us, only His nature will appear.

A person may claim to be a Christian and still be proud. He may claim to love the Lord and still have an abominable temper. He may believe himself to be sincerely devout and still be dirty in body and mind. We hide, or seek to hide, a multitude of sins back of our excuses about the Old Adam and the earth-earthly. But nothing utterly valueless is ever refined. The dirt from the street does not find its way into the crucible. We do not prune and spray thistles. The fact that the weakest and most inefficient Christian is ever in the Lord's melting-pot shows that he has a place in the plan of the Universe. If there is anything in us that looks like Jesus, it is due to the refining fire of His grace and discipline.

False Prophets and Deceivers

WEDNESDAY. Matt. 24:4. "Take heed that no man deceive you." We state it mildly when we say the average person is easily deceived about many things. An oculist has said that not more than one person out of ten has perfect eyes. The proportion of those who have perfect mental vision is probably much smaller. By no other theory can we account for the numerous fallacies which have prevailed among large numbers of people. It is an easy thing to make the false seem true, the unreal real. It takes less brain, less labor, less talent, less industry, less virtue, less consistency, to be a deceiver—for a time—than to do almost anything else. A study of the morbid psychology of the mob, of epidemic errors may lead us to an extreme view as to the gullibility of the race. No branch of thought has been free from irrational delusions—neither commerce, politics nor religion.

In religion a realm which, in the nature of the case, excludes ocular demonstration, a realm in which the senses have the least and reason the largest scope, there is a fertile field for deceivers. To the end of time there will be false healers, false prophets, false Christs. Only let us not be deceived. Let us fret not ourselves over the temporary triumph of some pseudoprophet. Let us adopt the Biblical method of trying the spirits to see whether they be of God. Let us preserve the right attitude with reference to religion.

What is it? On the one hand is the man who believes anything that strikes his fancy. On the other hand is the man who believes nothing he can not prove. Midway between these stands the moderate man, the normal, sane, thoughtful, deep-feeling man. He protests against the weakness of the fanatic and against the folly of the universal denier. Brave, truthful, vigilant, wary, hospitable to new truth, true to old truth, he protests with unfevered reason against the sophistry of those who never think beneath the surface and rejects with courage the creed which would reduce life to a mere chemical or mechanical formula. A believer thus planted, thus established, is superior alike to drifting winds of heresy and to storms of destructive criticism. He is on the rock. To the "Lo here and Lo there" of new faiths he says:

"I have seen the face of Jesus; tell me not of aught beside;

I have heard the voice of Jesus and my soul is satisfied."

A Priceless Inheritance

THURSDAY. Rom. 8:17. "If children, then heirs." A cab driver, sitting drowsily aloft with his lines in hand, was aroused by a voice asking, "Are you thus and so?" The speaker was an attorney who, on receiving an affirmative answer, continued, "I have a letter here stating that your uncle in England has left you twenty thousand pounds." The man looked dazed for a moment and then, realizing his good fortune, uncovered himself saying simply, "Goodbye, hat!" No more cab driving for the heir of a fortune!

If we could realize what it means to be possessed of the riches of divine grace, we should surely change the manner of our walk and conversation. How little would seem the beggarly rewards of this world, and how the eternal verities and sublimities would forge to the front! Let us ponder on the fact that by the spirit of adoption in Christ, we have become sons, sons of God; and if sons, "then heirs; heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away." This being so, what manner of persons ought we to be!

"Where Is the Lamb?"

FRIDAY. Gen. 22:7. "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?" If we could penetrate the darkest jungles and the remotest deserts, we would find no savage race without a consciousness of sin, and making some attempt to expiate that sin. The Hindoo mother who casts her child to the crocodiles of the Ganges; the African witch-doctor who slashes and lacerates his own flesh; others who tear out their hair pass through the fire and offer themselves to be buried alive—all do it for conscience sake, to get rid of sin.

But no man is saved by his own blood; no man can offer his own atonement. From our infancy we have been taught to sing that not the labor of our hands, nor zeal without respite nor everflowing tears could atone for sin. "Here is the fire, here is the wood; but where is the lamb?" asked the innocent lad.

And so, with true Christian insight, we may say: "Here is the instrument of torture, here the flowing Ganges, here the perfumed censor, here the crucifix; here are the works done and the money given; but how useless they all are without the Lamb!" Like the voice of the super-prophet he was, John the Baptist's cry came ringing through the wilderness of Judea—"Behold the Lamb of God!"

To the long historic procession of lowing cattle and bleating sheep and lambs headed by priests with uplifted knives, Jesus said, "Hold! Enough!" The cross is the emblem of reconciliation. It is the only place where men can get right with God. The proffer of a million-dollar check for the spread of Christianity does nothing to get a man right with God, if he has failed to get right at the cross.

It is the human story of a very wise old man and an ignorant lad; but it is the innocent question of the boy that bridges the centuries to that far cry of John the Baptist. Isaac knew what the sophisticated world does not know: that God only can prepare a sacrifice for sin.

The Duty Nearest at Hand

SATURDAY. I Kings 17:13. "Make me therefore a little cake first." These are the words of Elijah to the woman of Zarepath, who had only a handful of meal in a barrel and a little oil in a cruse. Elijah was the ambassador of Almighty God. He had a special mission to Israel. If his life was saved, he could complete that mission. God takes care of those who stand true to His messengers.

There are two hundred thousand ministers in the United States. They are the leaders in the army of the Lord. Victory will more surely come if we stand faithfully by them. If American is Christianized, the world will be evangelized. Make the little cake first for home missions in our cities, if you would have foreign missions flourish everywhere. The base of supplies must be protected, if the army is to be sustained. One must have riches before he can become benevolent. He must possess brains in order to think; strength before he can labor. Self-protection is the first law of nature. He who protects his family from harm is a patriot to the nation, for a nation is but an aggregation of families. He who defends the home, the school and the nation, acts as God does in the realm of His eternal kingdom.

Paul said: "I magnify my office"; that is my ministry. Elijah was called to the brook. He went, though it looked like a poor place for support. When the brook became dry, he was called to Zarepath, a still harder outlook for a living. If he had been looking for a soft, easy charge, how he would have murmured to the bishop! Elijah knew that the Heavenly Father made His appointments, though he took cheerfully the hardest places in the kingdom. Like Paul, he endured hardships and was able to accomplish great achievements, strengthened by the Almighty arm.

THE annual report of the Chicago Hebrew Mission shows that during the past year, 11,722 personal calls were made upon the Jews of Chicago, and 7,305 personal conversations held with them regarding their Saviour and Messiah. These resulted in professed acceptance of Christ by forty-four Jews, besides a goodly number of Poles and other nationalities. During the year 9,205 Jewish children attended the classes, clubs and Sunday schools of the mission, and 35,000 adults and children were reported as attending the 192 open-air meetings.

When a Problem Walked In

It Was That of Keeping a Home While "Mother" Was Ill

By A MERE MAN

FIRST of all, I want to say I am just an average American citizen, one of the one hundred million of this great and glorious republic, with an average business, an average income (never rises above $3,500 a year), an average set of brains, a wife, far above my ability (with whom I fell in love some twenty-five years ago, and I'm falling yet and hope I'll never stop), with three children, two boys and a girl, the older boy in college, and the younger one and his sister finishing high school.

We live in a fairly average house with eight rooms and a kitchen. My wife, myself and children belong to a church, the name of which you would know how to pronounce if I were to spell it. We all go to Sunday school, and don't understand why the neighbor's family doesn't go, and on the whole I suppose we are just about as well behaved generally as most average American families.

One evening when I came home, as usual, and took up the evening paper, my wife said, with a very serious look on her face, "What do you think! Jennie is going!"

Jennie was our "hired girl." We don't call her that now, but we did when we first hired her twenty years ago. I did not realize the meaning of what my wife said, and I replied, flippantly:

"Where is she going? To the movie?"

"She is going to get married!"

"Married! I haven't seen a policeman around here for a year."

"She is going to marry that man in Chicago. She has been corresponding with him for five years. He is a fellow countryman. You must remember."

Our Jennie, I should have said, is a Swedish girl, and I had heard of this correspondence from an occasional statement made by Jennie herself, but I had treated the matter lightly.

I laid down my paper, and the joy of life seemed to be suddenly clouded.

"But how can we live without Jennie?" I said, looking as serious as I felt.

"I don't know," said my wife. "It will mean a lot of things to have Jennie go."

And so it did. I will not dwell on the lot of things that happened after the sorrowful day that Jennie went out of our house and home, where for twenty years she had cooked and swept and washed and ironed and made the beds and purchased the food, and tended the children when they were little, and endeared herself so much to us that, now that she has some children of her own, she has named the first three after ours.

I will skip over the tragedy of the trials we had with cooks who couldn't cook, and housekeepers whom we couldn't keep, and washers who wouldn't wash. But one day I noticed that my wife was looking very tired, and I wondered if she was getting old. I had never thought of her as an old person. It struck me like a blow on the heart.

"My dear," I said, "you look tired."

"I am tired," she said, "tired of keeping house with incompetent help. And right now there is no help of any kind. There is hardly a housekeeper in town who can get help for love or blarney. I am afraid we may have to do what so many others are doing and go into an apartment house."

"An apartment house!" The very thought sent a chill accompanied with fever and ague and an operation, down the place where a minute before I had had a backbone.

"Never!" I said. "There must be some way out."

"I don't know where," said my wife very wearily. And with the words, for the first time since I had courted her, she fainted away.

I did not know what to do, but while I was trying to think of something, she came to. Then I sent for a doctor, and when he came he prescribed bed and a complete rest for several weeks, and that is how it came about that one mere man out of the one hundred million in this glorious republic took up the housekeeping problem. It was just simply a case of the Problem walking in and saying, "How'd' do! Come to put up with you for a while. Where's your spare-room?"

I HESITATE to speak of my experiences during the first week in which I boarded that Problem. But first of all I called a family council. I am proud to say that every member of our family came out strong at that meeting. The older boy said he would cut classes and give up college to help on the entertainment of the Problem. He said he would not miss some of the classes anyway, especially mathematics, which he disliked. It did not seem to me, however, that what he proposed was necessary; but I suggested certain duties to him, which I am proud to say he did with fidelity and efficiency. The boy and the girl in high school also expressed themselves cheerfully ready to quit school, but again I vetoed the proposition as unnecessary, if they would do their share of entertaining the Problem in the style to which he was accustomed. And I am proud of the way they accepted the challenge and stood by the chief cook and dishwasher, which I elected myself to be.

It would not be worth while to relate the time I had boarding the Problem during the first few weeks he was with us. My wife did not get any better, and one week I had a nurse to board along with the Problem. There was an epidemic in town, and all the hospitals were full, and I could not secure a place in any one of them. I will pass gently over the experiments I made with two or three housekeepers, whom, by dint of profiteer promises, I succeeded in enticing into the house for a few days apiece. So about the time my wife began to convalesce enough to permit me to attend to some of my business, I was giving the Problem the time of his life, and this is how it was done.

THE author of this delightfully written article is a man well known throughout this country who, for obvious reasons, prefers that this intimate home picture shall be anonymous. He describes one family's solution of a problem which, sooner or later, in some form or other, comes to almost every family. Perhaps it will help solve the problem for you when it comes to board at your house.

I had at first found it a desperate feat to watch toast in an electric toaster, to remember how many hours the eggs had been boiling, "turn the bacon over often," as the directions on the wrapper said, keep the oatmeal from burning on the bottom of the dish, pour the cream off of the top of the milk bottle and wash the one of yesterday and get it out on the back porch in time for the milkman, and to set the table, and do it all at once without spilling things on the kitchen floor. I came to respect my wife's business ability more than I ever respected the ability of the president of the bank where I sometimes put in money and often drew it out; and I shall never cease, as long as I live, to wonder at the skill and mental efficiency that can prepare three meals a day for a family of five people and keep a house going so that it is a home. I take off my hat to the housekeepers and homekeepers of America!

BUT to get to the real thing, after I had learned requirements of the Problem. A sample of one day's proceedings will answer for the whole week, with some changes in the bill of fare.

I was the first person up in the morning, and the kitchen fire was started by seven o'clock. We have natural gas in our town, which simplifies kitchen fires and cooking generally. The oatmeal had been put into the cooker the night before, so all I had to do was to put the cooker dish into a pan of hot water on the stove. We drink mild instant coffee, so a small teapot of water was started boiling for that. An electric stove made in compartments, was attached on the breakfast table and bread cut for toast. The girl set the breakfast table the night before.

By the time I had the bacon going, the older boy was downstairs, looking after the furnace. The younger boy wasn't quite so prompt always, but he never failed to appear by the time breakfast was ready; and he did gallant work helping his sister wash the dishes before they started for school. The girl also made her mother's breakfast and took it up to her.

From the time the match was struck which lighted the gas to the time we sat down to the table, was twenty minutes or twenty-five at the most. I insisted, I think with good reason, that we must not get demoralized by eating out in the kitchen or off the top of the stove, and that our table manners must be such that the Problem would have to use a clean napkin every meal, and not hurry. After we were all seated, we would have grace said, always remembering the invalid upstairs. Then the girl, who presided in the place of her mother, would start the toast going, and I would bring in, with the help of the older boy, the oatmeal and bacon, and filled the coffee-cups. If we had eggs (in case the hens of the district were not on a strike), we boiled them (the eggs) on the top of the electric stove. Our regular morning meal consisted of oatmeal or some cereal, hot toast, mild coffee, a little bacon for those who wanted it, and, sometimes when the market permitted, boiled eggs.

After the meal was over, the two boys would help clear off the table, and run the carpet-sweeper around the dining-room to pick up crumbs. Generally the girl and her brother would have time to wash up all the dishes before starting off to school. Meanwhile the college boy would have time to visit with his mother a little before starting for college, which is only two or three blocks from where we live.

EACH member of the family, I forgot to say, in the division of labor, took care of his own bedroom, making up beds and sweeping some time during the day, after the airing-out process had been faithfully observed. On Saturday afternoons the boys and the girl took the vacuum-cleaner and went over the entire house.

At noon our children at the high school ate at the cafeteria of the school and did not come home. The college boy would come home; and during the time his mother was getting well, but was not yet allowed to do any work, he would get her lunch and his own, which for himself consisted of a bowl of bread and milk, apple sauce (which by the way, I learned to make with great success, after I had burned about a bushel of apples), and a sandwich. During the wife's most serious illness, I stayed with her during the day, except a part of the time when a college girl came in to help a little and remain during the afternoon.

The evening meal was our most elaborate one. I cut out the golf and the Chamber of Commerce after five o'clock and came right home and got to work in the kitchen for the Problem, who by that time had an appetite as big as an income tax.

We had codfish and cream and baked potatoes, the latter baked in the compartment of the electric stove under the dish above, that was bubbling with the codfish. Bread and butter, often a lettuce salad with dressing furnished by the grocer, some kind of fruit, and once in a while a pie that the girl had made. I don't think the pie was always up to standard, if there is any, and sometimes the girl's brother, who went to high school with her, would ask her what happened to the carburetor or the starter or the differential.

Everybody helped to clear off the table, wash the dishes, set the table for breakfast and get things ready for the next day. With every one helping and the girl singing, "Every one works, even father," the work was out of the way, the sitting-room lamp turned on, the furnace fired for the night, and the family sitting around in mother's room, telling her what a jolly time we were having, and prescribing another week of complete rest. And I want to say here that the whole family kept mother in bed longer than she said was necessary. But she had the resting-time of her life, and when the color came back into her dear face and the sparkle into her eyes, and the strength into her life again, we all thanked the good God that she was spared to us, for we had never realized before she was taken ill how much we loved her and needed her.

WELL, we think we have solved the Housekeeping Problem without moving into an apartment house or a hotel and losing our home. I reckoned the other day that doing our own marketing and cooking and cleaning we are saving so much that I am putting money into the bank oftener than I am drawing it out. Our breakfasts costs us, on a careful computation, about ten cents apiece, and our evening meal twelve or, at the most, fifteen.

The time we spend doing the housework is so divided up among the five of us, even now when the wife helps, that it is not more than three hours a day, or perhaps on Saturdays or special cleaning days, four hours. My wife is growing young again. On the whole, we have the Problem to sleep, and if once in a while he has a nightmare, we change the bill of fare and try a simpler diet.

I am becoming such a good cook, even if I do say so, that if I were to fail in my business I know where I could get a good job as a chef in a hotel at $5,000 a year. Not bad for a $3,500 man!

Real Tire Economies are Here to Stay

THERE is unmistakable evidence that intelligent motorists and dealers will never return to the old wasteful tire buying and tire selling practices.

The thoughtful man is beginning to realize that thrift in tire buying depends upon how well he spends his tire money—not on how much he spends.

* * *

The right thinking tire merchant knows that the dealer who carries a split stock of tires and tells his customers to take their pick, is throwing back on them the very duty for which he receives a profit.

He knows that it is the dealer's business to know tires through and through.

To select from the market the very best tires his customers can get. To concentrate upon these tires and back them with his reputation and responsibility as a tire authority.

THE U. S. ROYAL CORD

The modern tire merchant is ruling out waste—cleaning his stock of odds and ends—and preparing for the new demands of the future.

The United States Rubber Company has always adhered strictly to its clean cut policy of stabilizing the tire business in the interest of the legitimate tire dealer and his customers.

Building a full and complete line of tires in all sizes. Each tire as fine, as efficient, and as economical as money, brains and human skill can make it. A tread for every road condition. A range of prices to meet the requirements of every motorist.

Thus reducing the dealer's risk and liabilities—lowering his inventory investment and his overhead expenses.

It is significant, therefore, that in times like these thousands of dealers all over America are concentrating on United States Tires. A saving to you and the dealer.

Remember the new kind of tire merchant when you are thinking of renewing your tires.

Awake to China's Need

FROM all parts of the country come welcome indications that Americans are beginning to realize the pitiable plight in which the five northern provinces of China find themselves. The governors of twelve states already have issued appeals indorsing President Wilson's original proclamation and urging the people of their states to rally to the aid of starving China.

From Washington has come a statement by the U. S. Chamber of Commerce, addressed to its 27,000 members consisting of individuals, chambers of commerce, boards of trade and other organizations. The statement urges this great membership of business men to give immediate aid to China on the twin grounds of "humanity and self-interest." In notifying the American Committee for China Famine Fund of the sending of this appeal, J. H. De-frees, president of the Chamber of Commerce, pledged his personal support to the effort being made by the Christian Herald and other agencies to feed these 15,000,000 starving people until the next harvest in June will enable them once again to take up the battle of life for themselves.

In our report last week we erred on the side of conservatism in giving an estimate of the number facing literal and absolute starvation at 11,000,000. Reports received since then confirm the earlier estimates that not fewer than 15,000,000 persons must rely on outside help to save them from death by starvation.

Christian Herald readers now have an opportunity of giving additional aid to the cause by helping to promote the sale of the new "Life-Saving" stamps. These stamps cost three cents each, so that the purchase of one stamp is equivalent to the saving of a single Chinese life for one day. The design was made and donated by William C. McNulty, art editor of the Christian Herald, and the American Committee for China Famine Fund is having them made in large quantities for national distribution. Women's Missionary Societies throughout the country are being asked to undertake the work of organization in connection with their distribution, and everywhere the aid of young people's societies and Sunday schools is being especially enlisted. Our readers can render valuable service by volunteering to their local committees to assist in the sale of these Life-Saving stamps. They can be obtained in large quantities by application to C. S. Clark, Campaign Sales Manager, Bible House, Astor Place, New York.

THE announcement of contributions received up to January 26 made in our last issue showed that Christian Herald readers had only just failed to pass the $400,000 mark. That mark, we are glad to report, has been left well behind and our eyes are now fixed on half a million dollars as the next mark ahead. The daily record of contributions for the last week was as follows:

January 27.....	$5,062.95
" 28.....	2,719.59
" 29.....	2,023.80
" 31.....	4,422.62
February 1.....	3,838.34
" 2.....	2,622.58
Grand Total.....	$415,716.78

All monies received by the Christian Herald are now turned over for prompt transmission to China to the American Committee for China Famine Fund, which is charged with the task of co-ordinating all American relief agencies. The American Committee has announced the appointment of a local committee in Peking which will receive, administer, apportion and account for all money raised in this country. The American Minister, Charles R. Crane, is ex-officio chairman of the Peking Committee, and its membership is made up of Americans resident in China and prominent in missionary, philanthropic and business activities.

The following have been appointed

All Parts of United States
Replying to Appeals for the Starving to serve on the Peking Committee: Frederick W. Stevens; George L. Davis, of the Methodist Church; George D. Wilder, of the Congregational Church; John D. Haynes, of the Presbyterian Church; Henry I. Dockweiler, nominee of Vicar Apostolic Jarlin; John Earle Baker, of the Ministry of Communications and the Red Cross; R. R. Gailey, Y. M. C. A.; Roger S. Green, Rockefeller Institute; C. R. Bennett International Banking Corporation; Henry C. Emory, Asia Banking Corporation; Robert Colman, Standard Oil; and Morgan Palmer, of the Salt Gabelle.

ONE of the most generous contributors to the Christian Herald fund for China has been Mr. Ralph Leininger, of Brooklyn, who in one mail sent in checks aggregating $8,100—$5,000 as his own gift, $3,000 from Mrs. Emma C. Leininger and $100 from their son, Austin Leininger. Previously he had sent two checks for $1,000 each. In explanation of his contributions, he sent the following letter to Mr. Graham Patterson, publisher of the Christian Herald and vice-chairman of the executive committee of the American Committee for China Famine Fund appointed by President Wilson:

"Dear Mr. Patterson:

"My recent checks for eight thousand one hundred dollars ($8,100) go to make up a total of ten thousand dollars ($10,100) for the Christian Herald China Famine Fund. This is a very much larger sum than I had intended giving, having so many other demands, and since my annual income is about two and a half times this amount. It is, therefore, not given from great resources since I am only moderately fixed financially, but I am deeply impressed with the great necessity of doing for China in its distress, where the conditions differ from those of Europe where the people are underfed and undernourished, while in China the people are actually starving. My desire is to encourage the splendid work of the Christian Herald and, also, to applaud the noble sacrifices of the committee which has been appointed to conduct this work in a larger way, and the co-operation of those who are interesting themselves in this greatest of all human needs.

"In view of these facts, I feel it my duty to go the limit to encourage all those who are so splendidly engaged in this movement and, if possible, to inspire others to make similar gifts which, after all, are investments; especially in the case of China, since were it possible to unite the Mongolian against the Caucasian races, a most serious condition would arise to threaten our modern civilization. Therefore, it is one of the greatest privileges of the American people to bring China to a closer relationship by going to her aid in this her hour of despair.

"I trust that your committee will not have for its goal any given sum of money, but that its slogan will be "The Saving of a Nation from Starvation."

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "RALPH LEININGER."

Contributions for the relief of China's starving millions may be addressed to the Christian Herald China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City.

ALTHOUGH game-breeding in the United States is still in its infancy, there are today more than a million affiliated bird students and conservationists and half that number of sportsmen who are working for bird and game preservation. It has been shown that many wild game birds can be propagated successfully in captivity. In nature probably less than ten per cent. of the eggs of game birds develop into mature birds. By artificial cultivation as high as an eighty per cent. yield has often been attained when conditions are favorable.

Rewards of Faithfulness

International Sunday School Lesson for February 27
Matt. 25:14-30

By LUTHER DENNY WHITTEMORE, Litt.D.

THE more familiar we become with the parables of Jesus, the more we are impressed by their wonderful variety in subject-matter and in spiritual teaching. Using illustrations from the experiences of common life, Jesus made spiritual things comprehensible, and at the same time interpreted common life in spiritual terms. The occupations of the farm, of the household, of society, of industry, and of commerce have become sacred because in the parables of the sower and the seed, the woman and the leaven, the good Samaritan, the prodigal son, the fisherman's net, the marriage feast, the wise and the foolish virgins, and the pounds and the talents, the connection between the earthly and the heavenly life, was so clearly shown. In these ways Jesus presented in concrete form the principles of the kingdom of heaven and the duties and the privileges of its citizens.

The parable of the talents had a definite place in the preparation of the disciples for their Master's departure. The manifestation of increasing hostility towards Him must have convinced observers that the end which He had foretold was not far distant; and therefore the minds of the disciples were ready to receive the words of warning, of comfort, and of instruction which Jesus spoke in the temporary calm following the stormy conflict in the temple. While His enemies were preparing their plot against his life, Jesus was preparing His disciples for the great change which awaited them, impressing upon them the need of watchfulness for His coming, and the duty of diligence and faithfulness until He should come again.

The parable of the talents is eminently practical. Although the reader instinctively rejoices with the rewarded servants and laments the faithlessness which brought disaster upon the unprofitable servant, who buried his talent in the earth, the parable appeals primarily to common sense and sound judgment, rather than to sentiment; and through the ages it has been a wholesome stimulus to industrious effort and fidelity. At many points it touches the life of the Christian in the world today.

DIVERSITY of Gifts. The word "talent," originally a weight of gold or silver, or an amount of money, is now used almost exclusively in the sense required in the interpretation of the parable, to denote peculiar ability of any kind; for money, although it may be used as a mighty power for good, is not the means by which the world or individuals have been chiefly blest. Jesus, the world's greatest benefactor, gave Himself, not money, and His personality has been multiplied in the lives of all those who have followed in His steps.

Among the disciples there was a diversity of gifts. In a sense all had enjoyed equally the privilege of association with Jesus; but Peter, James, and John, the three who were most intimate with Him, were like the servant who received five talents, splendidly meeting the Lord's expectations and meriting His approval. Others, as perhaps Jesus wished to hint, were not so conspicuously gifted, but, like the servant who received two talents, they also proved faithful and were rewarded. Only one, the faithless Judas, was like the wicked and slothful servant who hid his talent in the earth, and returning it unused, condemned himself to outer darkness.

Nothing is more obvious than the individual differences which distinguish people from each other, but in the various activities of organized society there is a place for talent of every kind. No one need be envious because another seems to occupy a more conspicuous place, nor disheartened because his own place in the world seems small; for in the sight of God there is only one standard by which accomplishment is tested, and that is faithfulness in matters great and small.

In the Church itself what varied opportunities there are for service; and how necessary it is, both for the satisfaction of the individual and for the progress of the Kingdom that each member should find his place and fill it according to his ability!

Individual accountability. No one can escape his individual responsibility. Whatever talent one possesses must be treasured as a gift of God and used in the service of God and man. In the modern world great enterprises are carried on by associations, and the group sometimes imposes its will upon the individual; but this does not destroy personal responsibility. To hide one's talent in the crowd, or in the organization to which he may belong, may be as discreditable as to hide it in the earth. Not as groups, but as persons we shall be called to account for failure or success.

In the parable the servant who received a single talent, nevertheless a considerable sum, was the one who failed; but presumably his failure would have been equally disastrous if he had received five talents. Nor can it be inferred that those who succeeded would have failed had they been intrusted with a smaller gift.

SUCCESS and effort. The successful servants did not succeed by accident. They went and traded. Hoarded wealth does not increase, nor does unused talent grow. Seed must be planted and the growing plant cultivated before the harvest can be gathered. Intellectual powers and social gifts as well as spiritual graces grow also by use and cultivation. To an observer it sometimes seems as if success comes without effort, but there is no real success that does not require toil and sacrifice. Wealth inherited or easily acquired is often a hindrance rather than a help; and such resources are not talents gained but talents given, and thereby responsibility is increased.

Fear and failure. In excusing his failure the unfaithful servant said, "I was afraid"; and this was perhaps the secret of his failure, for fear produces its paralyzing effects before an enterprise is undertaken, rather than during the period of effort. The coward is conquered before danger appears, and by the fear of imaginary dangers; but the truly brave can say with Browning:

"Then welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand, but go!
Be our joys three-parts pain!
Strive and hold cheap the strain;
Learn nor account the pang; dare never grudge the throe!"

"For thence—a paradox
Which comforts while it mocks—
Shall life succeed in that it seems to fail:
What I aspired to be, and was not comforts me."

To him that hath. To take the talent away from the unfaithful servant and give it to him who already had ten talents was not an act of arbitrary favoritism, but the application of an inviolable law. But the mistake should not be made of supposing that the parable justifies an industrial or social system under which the idle rich grow richer and the industrious poor grow poorer. The one talent was not taken away because the possessor had only one, but because he had not been faithful; nor was it given to him who had ten talents because he had ten talents, but because he had been faithful; for "he that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much."

Do children welcome like these Bubble Grains?

Puffed Grains are the finest cereals children ever get. And the cereals that you want them to like best.

Then why not keep all three on hand—Puffed Wheat, Puffed Rice, Puffed Corn? Get all the delights they offer.

Puffed Wheat supplies whole wheat.

Puffed Rice supplies whole rice.

Puffed Corn is toasted corn hearts puffed to airy bits.

Why we explode them

The grains are steam exploded, shot from guns. They come to you as bubble grains, light, airy, crisp. That, of course, is what makes them enticing. But the purpose is to blast the granules and fit them to digest.

A hundred million food cells lie in every kernel. We explode them all. Then all the many elements can be assimilated. Prof. A. P. Anderson, the food expert, was inventor of this process.

Cooking breaks some food cells, toasting will break more. But puffing alone breaks them all.

These airy grains, puffed to eight times size, seem like food confections. They taste like tidbits, made only to delight. But they mean grain foods so prepared that every atom feeds.

Millions of mothers who know these facts serve them morning, noon and night.

For breakfast

The supreme dainties are Puffed Rice and Puffed Corn. Serve with cream and sugar, with melted butter, or mix them in your fruit.

For supper

Puffed Wheat in milk supplies a practically complete food. It is easy to digest. And you never serve a milk dish more inviting.

Shall the World Become an Armed Camp?

Within the month, three of the great nations of the world have laid down plans for battleships to cost more money than is spent annually for schools in the United States.

America's bill for army and navy in 1921 would send 10,000,000 children to school for a year.

The world has gone mad on militarism, and all because of a belief that arms mean safety, and that "the big stick" is the best insurance policy.

But, do arms mean safety,

And is "the big stick" the best insurance of peace?

The Christian Herald doesn't think so, and it has put its belief into words.

In a coming issue, Dr. Henry A. Atkinson will discuss Disarmament, and those who are beginning to doubt the wisdom of overwhelming armament will do well to watch for this article.

DAVID caught the excitement, brought the box and quickly opened it. Instead of the yellow gold of Thalia's dream they found rolls of parchment, some yellow with age, some comparatively fresh and new. Opening the rolls they found in clear bold characters writing that was strange to Thalia, but which caused David to exclaim:

"The writing is Hebrew, my own language! Did you not say that this box has been in your family for generations?"

"Yes, David, and mother has told me again and again that only the oldest son in each generation of our family line had ever opened the box or known what was in it. It was her belief that each one who opened the box added something to its contents."

"But your people do not know the Hebrew tongue," exclaimed David. "How is it that these writings which must have come down from them are in the language of the Hebrews?"

"I know not, but perhaps the writings will explain."

"You know, Thalia, that I am not skilled to read my own language, but when the morning is fully come I will hasten to the scribe at the temple and he will read for us what is written in these rolls."

The simple breakfast was soon over. The children went to their play under the olive trees. David with the box held fast hastened down the Mount to find the scribe at the temple.

Thalia watched from the door until he was out of sight, then turned into the desolate home, her home no longer after this day.

All the joy and lightness that had come with her dream vanished. The blackness of thick darkness again closed in upon her. What should she do? How pass the time till David returned? She stood irresolute, lonely, heartbroken.

SHE would grind the barley for the noonday meal, the last in her home. As she grasped the bar, and with slow heavy movement began to turn, she felt that her heart was between the upper and nether millstones. The barley was left unground.

She would prepare the small bundles of clothing to be carried by her and David and Ruth as they go out at evening time, aliens from the loved home. No, not that. The children would see and ask questions. That must wait.

She would pray to her god, Baal. Prone upon the floor she cast herself before the carved stone image, and, like the prophets of old, cried out, "O, Baal, hear me! O, Baal, hear me!" But there was none to answer. In a frenzy of anguish she sprang from the floor, grasped the unheeding image and with a heavy weight crushed it and cast the fragments into the ashes.

She was roused from her despair by the voices of the children, shouting as they ran down the hill side. She hastened to the door. Half way up the Mount came David with leaps and bounds. He caught up Ruth to her place on his shoulder. Young David clung close to the arm that carried the box and she heard their ringing laughter as they hurried up the slope. Her dream!

AS THEY neared the house David sent the children back to their play and hastened forward. Her dream again, for he clasped her so close that she was ready to cry out, as he poured forth his joyful message.

"O, Thalia, my own! You need not go from me! You are mine, mine forever, my Thalia!" and the strong man who had shed no tears in all those bitter days wept in utter abandonment of joy.

Too dazed for tears Thalia exclaimed, "Tell me, David, tell me quickly, that I may know this joy will not vanish like my dream?"

"When I reached the temple this morning," he said, "I found not the scribe whom I sought but soon I saw the great Priest, Ezra, walking in the temple court. As I was passing near him he fixed his eyes upon the box and in stern tones demanded: 'How dare you bring that box, carved with heathen symbols, into the very temple court of our God? Away with it! Pollute not our holy temple!' Quickly I lifted the lid and his eyes fell on the parchments written in Hebrew. With eager haste he came near, and almost before I could grant his request he had the rolls and was reading.

"Whence had you these writings?" he demanded. I told him all that you had told me concerning the box. 'Was your wife's father Haniel, the son of Beriah?' he asked. 'Yes, I knew her father well in my boyhood. His name was Haniel and often I have heard her speak of her grandfather Beriah. But how know you these names?' I questioned.

"From these rolls," he answered. 'You say your wife was of Assyrian lineage; that her people were brought by Nebuchadnezzar from the Upper Zab and settled in this land when the tribes of Judah and Benjamin were carried to Babylon, and that she is one of the alien wives sentenced to depart today from our land. But these are Hebrew names and these parchments trace the lineage of this family back in direct, unbroken line to Asher, a mighty man of valor, the son of Jacob. When the children of Israel came from Egypt to this land of promise and the land was divided by lot to the twelve tribes, the lot Asher fell to the northwest, bordering Phoenicia.

"Here, according to these records, they lived and prospered. For many years they kept up the forms of the Hebrew worship but when the land was divided into the northern and southern kingdoms they, with many others of the northern Kingdom, fell entirely away from the worship of Jehovah.

"When the Assyrians began their conquests westward the first of the Hebrew people to be carried into captivity was this tribe of Asher. They were considered a rare prize because of their skill in the Phoenician arts. When Assyria fell under the Babylonian power Nebuchadnezzar separated them far asunder, to people various lands whose inhabitants had been colonized in Babylon and other parts of his empire. A small colony of these people with others from Assyria was brought into this land, and according to these documents, your wife is of that colony and of undoubted Hebrew stock.

"In your wife's family the Hebrew instinct for keeping family records could not wholly die, so the line of heredity was kept unbroken and secret by the records in the carved box, always in charge of the oldest son, while the others, in the two hundred years of their residence in Assyria, forgot their Hebrew ancestry entirely."

"I HAD not dared to interrupt the great Priest as he told this long story," David went on, "though my heart was crying out to know if the sentence of banishment would still be executed against you, my Thalia, since you worship not Jehovah, but the god Baal. I told him the truth and waited breathless for his answer.

"The law of Moses must not be broken," he said gravely. 'Your wife is of pure Hebrew blood, of the tribe of Asher, of the stock of Israel, a daughter of Abraham. No edict of banishment can prevail against her.'

"When he saw how I was moved by his words he said in tones more kindly than I thought he could command, 'She should put away her false gods and become a worshiper of Jehovah.'"

Silently Thalia led her husband to where the fragments of her carved Baal lay in the ashes.

"David, I will worship Jehovah," she said reverently, "and together let us thank Him for this great day in which He has turned our mourning into gladness.

"And thanks be to His holy name forever that we have not told the children."

Being a "Go-Between"

IF Josh Billings had lived in the Orient he would have said: "Never do anything yourself. Always have a 'go-between.'" So it came about that Mrs. Scott made her first and only proposal of marriage.

How an American Arranged for a Japanese Pastor's Marriage

By F. N. SCOTT
Nagasaki, Japan

We had in a measure helped a certain young man to go to America, where he was graduated from college, and afterwards took a year of post-graduate work. When he got back to Japan he became a pastor, and soon began to look for a wife. At last he settled on a young lady who was teaching in a prominent Woman's Foreign Missionary Society Girls' School. Then he asked us to act as "go-between."

We remembered the case of Miles Standish, but our dilemma was not like John Alden's.

I called the lady over to my house and text to approach her direct, so that time she left without being asked anything beyond the musical matter. However, the young man still had some American ideas, and he insisted he meant just what he said and wanted us to act as a real "middle-man." And this time Mrs. Scott made the proposal. I do not know just how she did it, but the answer was all right.

THEN came the question of writing the formal letters to the parents, which was my part. I told his parents how fine she was, and laid special emphasis on the fact that she was the daughter of a samurai, though I also mentioned that she was a college graduate and a fine musician. But it was in the letter to her father that I exhausted my vocabulary to show how fine a young man he was, and how desirable he would be as a son-in-law.

Then, to make sure, I asked a Japanese friend, a very influential graduate of Chinzai Gakuin, and who is also the president of the school where her father was a teacher of fencing, to act as my intermediary in getting his consent. I did this because I knew the father was a samurai of the old school, and likely to have some pretty strong ideas of his own. Even then I was not so very much surprised when my friend wrote to me that he could get no satisfaction at all out of the old gentleman. He did not think he wanted a pastor for a son-in-law, and feared the rest of the family would not approve. It looked as if the negotiations would have to end there.

However, we got the young lady to go and see the family, and then I learned that if I approached the father again formally he would give his consent. This I did, again through any friend, asking him to wire the answer. Meanwhile the young man's father had replied favorably. So, when I got the telegram I at once hurried over to tell the girl that everything was all right.

The wedding invitations were issued in our names, and we had a fine Christian ceremony, Mrs. Scott being matron of honor. The ceremony was performed by Dr. K. Uzaki, President of Chinzai Gakuin, assisted by the writer, and the refreshments furnished by the Methodist missionaries apparently were appreciated to the full. The wedding journey was a short visit to his parents.

In view of the fact that the "go-between" is held responsible in case the couple quarrel, it affords me pleasure as well as relief to say that they are very happy.

God's Providence in Agriculture

E. L. Hos. 2:14-23

GOD, through the prophet Hosea, speaks a promise to his people that He will bless the earth with all manner of harvests. Since then "seed time and harvest has not ceased." Where humanity has not put itself in the way of revelation, the experts through whom God speaks, the Burbanks and the soil wizards, the harvests may cease. But this is the day of the agriculture school, the "back to the land" movements, "the homesteader," and the day when the Church through its department of rural evangelism is the modern prophet of God, teaching, helping, inspiring the people to be productive, making not only two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before, but through irrigation and fertilization causing to spring up great harvests where nothing grew before. This is progress. God is always in such progress.

How Can We Make Our Lives Useful?

C. E. Eph. 6:5-6

THE answer to this question is found in the reference. "Not with eyeservice, as men-pleasers, but as servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." "He who will be great among you, let him be your minister." The true meaning of life is ministry, not mastery. The biography and autobiography of great men and women reveal the fact that they were above all the public servants, striving for the greatest good of the many. Jesus is our Example. "He went about doing good." Follow in the steps of Jesus and there will be no question of your usefulness.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

The Man As I Knew Him

By

FERDINAND COWLE IGLEHART, D.D.

Many Thousands Own This Authoritative Work

Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett says:

"Dr. Iglehart has done his work admirably. His book gives a very intimate and human knowledge of Theodore Roosevelt. It admits us into privacies which unveil the great leader in even larger aspects of wealthy manhood. Dr. Iglehart's personal friendship with Mr. Roosevelt enabled him to unfold these secrets of his deeper life. The book is excellently written and deserves to be widely read."

Dr. Iglehart's biography of Roosevelt is intensely personal. It is the kind of book that will be read with sympathy and pleasure by old and young in many a modest home. The book will be a family treasure for one reason above all others, namely, that its hero-worship is genuine from beginning to end. It begins by giving Roosevelt a sure rank [with Washington and Lincoln], and then proceeds to tell the story of his boyhood, his youth, and his manhood, in a very readable, unsophisticated fashion that does credit not only to the robust American manhood of the subject, but also to that of the nature-loving, humane, and large-spirited author. The Review of Reviews.

THE BOOK is printed on fine book paper and includes 16 pages of illustrations on plate paper. There are 432 pages, in 32 chapters. The binding is fine cloth embossed. Size 5x7 1/4 inch.

Hon. Chauncey M. Depew says:

"I have read Dr. Iglehart's 'Roosevelt as I Knew Him,' with instruction and pleasure. It is of great value to the historian of the future to have this estimate and story of the most interesting character of our time from his intimate friend. 'Roosevelt was one of the most human of men and the cold facts of his career fail to do him justice. The author has happily met that need, as we have Roosevelt as he was.'

by King Constantine in Athens. He declared that Mustapha Kemal was only a big bubble and "we could blow him off the map as we would blow a fly off the table," adding that the Nationalists were sick of war and ready to seek any refuge to save themselves. The restored king insisted Greece must hold Smyrna and Thrace, placing that condition on his willingness to enter into negotiations with the responsible Turkish Government.

The Allied governments have made no move toward a reconciliation with Constantine's régime and their ministers in Athens still hold aloof. Busy with more important events, the Allies apparently are waiting for financial stringency and the lapse of time to bring a solution of the problems involved in Constantine's return to the throne.

DOMESTIC

PARDON FOR DEBS REFUSED. President Wilson has rejected a recommendation by A. Mitchell Palmer, Attorney General, for the commutation of the sentence of Eugene V. Debs, five times the Socialist candidate for President, and now serving a prison term, which does not expire until the close of 1925, for violation of the Espionage Act.

GOVERNOR OF MAINE DIES. Governor Frederic Hale Parkhurst of Maine died from pneumonia at the age of fifty-seven, after he had served only twenty-five days of his term. He was automatically succeeded by the president of the state senate, Percival P. Baxter.

BERGER TO HAVE NEW TRIAL. The conviction of Victor Berger and four associates for violating the Espionage Act was reversed by the United States Supreme Court, because Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis did not retire from the case after the presentation of an affidavit attacking him as prejudiced. The action made necessary a new trial for the five men, each of whom had been sentenced for twenty years.

FORD LOSES ON RECOUNT. Completion of the recount of ballots in the Michigan senatorial election of 1918 left Senator Newberry, Republican, with a plurality of 4,334 over Henry Ford, who made a net gain of 3,233 votes in the recount. This proceeding was distinct from fraud charges and criminal proceedings growing out of that election.

BRINDELL FOUND GUILTY OF EXTORTION. Robert P. Brindell, president of the Building Trades Council in New York City, was found guilty of extorting $5,000 from a builder for calling off a strike, an offense carrying a maximum sentence of fifteen years. His conviction was the first resulting from 175 indictments of employers and labor men in the exposure of widespread corruption in the building trades.

FOREIGN

NEW CUBAN ELECTIONS IN MARCH. Partial elections in districts in Cuba where courts or election boards have nullified the results of the November presidential election are to be held about March 1. Enough districts are affected to determine the succession to the presidency.

PERU ENTERTAINS AMERICAN FLEET. American officers and sailors were welcomed enthusiastically in Peruvian cities when the Atlantic fleet took up anchorage in Callao harbor, and Lima was lavishly decorated and illuminated in honor of the visitors. At the same time the Pacific fleet was being received with warm hospitality at Santiago, Chile.

POLISH PRESIDENT IN PARIS. Marshal Pilsudski, president of Poland, and Prince Sapieha, his foreign minister, have arrived in Paris for an official visit, which was attributed to a desire to tighten the alliance with France as a precaution against a Bolshevik attack.

Investing in Mission Schools

IT IS not generally known—to put the fact in commercial phraseology—that practically the entire output of the Protestant missionary schools in Latin America is being absorbed by the public school systems as fast as the graduates can be turned out, both boys and girls.

It Is Profitable Even from a Strictly Business Standpoint

By AGNES C. LAUT

In Mexico and Yucatan, more than 500 native graduates of Protestant mission schools are filling executive positions in Mexico's educational system. The same thing holds good in both Chile and Argentina.

Counting two-thirds of the population as children, or five-sevenths of the population as children, Mexico with her population of 15,000,000 could absorb 100,000 teachers a year. Let us suppose that the American missionary schools were financially able so to expand as to furnish the children of Mexico with these 100,000 teachers.

Supposing 100,000 teachers, trained in the ideals of American democracy, passed those ideals on to 10,000,000 Mexican youths a year. Of those 10,000,000, there would be at least one million graduates into public and private life a year. Would there be any Mexican problem? Would revolution follow revolution?

Mexico has had fifty-nine different revolutions in sixty-one years; and while Latin-American republics may not have had quite as many revolutions, their instability of government, of observance of law, of respect for life and property have given investing capital periodic cold chills about once in every ten years.

WE MAY denounce capital as a sordid thing—call it "dollar diplomacy," if you like. But what supports schools and opens industry and pays wages and builds railroads is capital; and no matter how rich a country may be, what capital primarily invests in is not the natural wealth of the country, it is the stability of the country. And when you analyze stability, it works down to the human units—the children, who grow into the men and women governing the country's destiny; and where there is no stability, capital will not go.

Argentina is today the favorite investment center for American capital among the Latin republics; and it is the favorite because of its stable conditions. Its school system is the best in Latin-America; and that system got its nucleus from the graduates of Protestant mission schools. Chile and Peru are passing through the same transition stage now; and Mexico is just at the beginning.

A good example of all this occurred during October in one of the largest banking institutions in New York. It had sent a man down to make a secret financial survey of the Latin-American republics. The bank was literally bulging with money to lend at from 6 to 8 per cent. per annum. The countries visited by this financial expert were paying from 3 to 6 per cent. a month, or 72 per cent. annually. The investigator came back literally intoxicated with enthusiasm. Why, those countries had untold, unguessed, hidden wealth of the very commodities the world needed—hard woods, copper, silver, oil in areas that had not yet been tapped.

His report dealt very especially with Venezuela, Colombia, Honduras and Mexico; and he wrote a book that rioted with opportunities for investment; but just as the book was put in print, one Latin-American republic forcibly overthrew its president. Another rumbled with a revolutionary earthquake; and a third threatened to confiscate foreign property. The bank piled the books in its cellar. It did not dare issue a book advising its clients to invest their money in centers where the instability of human conditions might risk all the money invested. American banks have been bitten badly in Russia. They dare not risk another $50,000,000 fiasco.

Owing to the warm climate, the cheapness of cotton clothes and fruit foods, it costs only $150 a year to clothe, feed and educate a Latin-American child.

Foreign commerce between Latin-America and the United States has increased during the four years of the Great War from $800,000,000 to $1,700,000,000.

As a purely financial consideration the missionary schools are one of the most paying investments offered to the great commercial interests of the United States.

Friendship among nations does not make for national absorption. It makes for respect of national sovereignty, as it has made between Canada and the United States, who are each other's best commercial customers today. What a wonderful field Latin-America offers for mission investments!

The Library as an Open Door

of the various librarians in winning the confidence of the immigrant. Chicago and Minneapolis and other libraries are letting the foreigners know that they have shelves well stocked with books in their own tongue, and talks on citizenship, American life, and opportunities are given in many libraries to interest the people to study English. One could tell many stories of the work of the libraries in St. Louis, Buffalo, Boston, Louisville, Springfield, Mass., and other places where efforts have been made to have the newcomer feel at home. In all these places the human understanding is hastening the process. One and all feel that it is the personal contact that helps even to giving assistance in many matters of daily life. Books are loaned, but this is only a part of the effort to interest. Personally conducted trips through the library, letter-writing, and innumerable other attentions are bestowed on the bewildered immigrant.

ALL in all it has been the usual experience that attempts to open our libraries to newly arrived foreigners are a success. Imposing buildings do not attract the immigrant, who is often afraid to enter, and when once in he fears he may commit himself to something. The newcomer must be told that it is friendship as well as books that he may expect, and the librarian finds it necessary to take the initiative and try to reach him so that he will come, enjoy and gain the benefits. It has been found that in some instances the priest and rabbi are mediums through whom the foreign population can be reached. Posters, handbills and prints can be sent through them.

Again and again it has been recognized that what the immigrant needs to become interested in our American civilization is a way of approach, some sort of open sesame or bond of sympathy. This he finds at public libraries. These institutions recognize that they have a tremendous opportunity to make their influence felt in the Americanization problem. They have already started to do their share toward assimilating people of different nations. The libraries in this work feel gratified at results already obtained and are eager to adopt any feasible method that will draw the foreigners closer to American life.

The library is a sort of open door through which the immigrant catches glimpses of the ideals of America. In some sections it can do as much as schools to help the bewildered newcomers. It is a medium through which many become acquainted with the new land and already some librarians have obtained magic results in bringing the foreign-born population in touch with America.

Questions and Answers

A WESTERN reader, Clinton B. Day, Salem, Ore., sends us this delightful letter, apropos of a recent paragraph in the Mail-Bag.

"Your reply in the Mail-Bag to M. T. Greensboro, N. C., that 'God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb' is in substance at least found in Sterne's 'Sentimental Journey,' brought back quite vividly to my mind a time when I was much exercised as to the percentage of truth in certain great and beautiful utterances concerning Divine providence and benevolence. I remember that I purchased the 'Sentimental Journey,' and found the words came from the lips of Maria: 'She found her way alone across the Apennines, had traveled all over Lombardy without money, and through the flinty roads of Savoy without shoes: how she had borne it, and how she had got supported, she could not tell; but God tempers the winds, said Maria, to the shorn lamb.' I remember with what avidity I ran down Browning's 'God's on his throne. All's right in the world'; Tupper's 'All's for the best'; Shakespeare's 'There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will'; and St. Paul's 'And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God.' If Paul's statement, as quoted apart from the context, ever becomes true, it will be only when Satan passes out of existence, when human hatred and strifes pass from off the earth, and when sin ceases its devastations in human souls. We joyously believe that God worketh all things together for good to them that love Him. Paul, with heart aglow as he saw the great outflow of divine grace to our race (see Rom. 8:11-33) could not refrain from stating the fact that in everything He does, God is our Helper and Saviour. God is the antecedent term in the text! 'A divinity shaping our ends,' there surely is (see Gen. 14:5, 8) but sin and folly frustrate God's ends or aims.

'O, but man . . . like an angry ape. Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven As make the angels weep.'

'All's for the best,' is true only in heaven! 'God's on his throne. All's right in the world,' was surely true to little Pippa, in her limited view, as she went on her way—gladsome as the birds and beautiful and fragrant in her innocence; as the flowers on that springtime morning. If she had been in the slum of a great city, or stood where evidences of human crimes were displayed, as on a battlefield or place of massacre, or where famine and disease raged her words would evidently have been: 'God's on His throne; but in spite of his salutary laws, and all-wise and good government, things are not right in His world.'

Reader, Mr. Vernon, N. Y. The best way to enjoy the Christian life is, having asked forgiveness and taken God at His word, not to be thinking all the time about your own feelings and emotions, but to forget yourself in doing what you can for others in Jesus' name. Think of others. You do not need to worry over your spiritual condition, if, as you say, you are anxious to be good. He is faithful that promised. Fill your heart with the thought of what you can do for a great world that is in need. Pray for others, and not so much for yourself, if you would find the peace that passeth understanding.

J. W. O., Coleman Falls, Va., writes: "The Bible says the time will come when the nations will bend their swords into pruning hooks and war will be no more. And in the Book of Revelation, from the 7th to the 11th chapters inclusive, it gives an account of the seven angels that sounded the trumpets. When the sixth angel sounded there was a great world-war. It may be that the European war was the sounding of the sixth angel. When the seventh angel sounded, they said in heaven: 'The kingdoms of the world have become the kingdoms of Christ.' So, according to the Bible, there is to be a time when wars will cease and peace will reign. God works through human agency to perform His purposes in the world. We have laws against murder. What is more natural and what more reasonable and what more in accord with Christianity and in harmony with the teachings of Jesus than that the nations should take steps to prevent the wholesale murder of war? The League of Nations to prevent war is the greatest step the human race has taken since the Crucifixion."

Rev. M. S. Godshall, Carbondale, Pa., writes: "Through the kindness of some one I am receiving copies of the Christian Herald. The paper is good, but I have misgivings regarding one department, namely, 'The Sunday Service at Home.' Are you not encouraging a number of people to stay away from Sunday evening service, while we are wrestling with the problem? You know, as well as all ministers, that many people will be glad of any excuse to stay at home on Sunday evenings."

Our Sunday Home Service, as has been repeatedly stated in the Christian Herald, is not to be regarded in any sense as a substitute for the regular service, or an excuse for not attending the church. To the aged and feeble, the shut-in or any who, owing to distance, or for any good and sufficient reason, may be deprived of the privilege of worshipping in the Lord's House, the Home Service comes with special appeal. It meets the need of a class who, if not ministered to in some such way as this, would have no service at all.

W. P. S., Lindsay, Calif. By an oversight the types in a recent issue made us say 350 years since Cromwell and Charles II instead of 250 years. We are glad you called attention to the matter.

Mrs. L. M., Clinton, Mich. The passage in Psalm 51:4 must be read in its immediate connection with the preceding verses. David's sin against Uriah was also a grievous sin against God, and David now felt that it rested with God alone to grant forgiveness. No reparation was possible to Uriah, he being dead, and no forgiveness could therefore be asked of him. It was God alone who must be the judge and assign the punishment. David therefore pleaded with God, and in his confession of guilt, flung himself absolutely upon the Divine mercy. Some commentators hold that his prayer implies that by God's granting forgiveness in view of David's confession and deep repentance, the sinner might be brought through chastisement to penitence and salvation. In this sense, man's unrighteousness would be made to bring to light the righteousness and mercy of God, who "will have mercy on whom He will have mercy." (See Rom. 9:15, 18.)

Reader, Germantown, Pa. Christianity was probably first recognized in Britain in the second century, A.D. In his story of early London, Sir Water Besant says that according to tradition, the first missionaries were Paul and Joseph of Arimathea, and later, Lazarus and his two sisters. In 324 A.D. Christianity, which had made slow progress at first, became the recognized religion of the State. The British Church gave assent to the conclusions of the great Council of Nicaea. There was an Established Christian Church in Britain at that time.

N. J. Weiland, Galeton, Colo., writes: "We have organized here in Galeton a community church. Our board of trustees will consist of five members of different denominations. We have a good church. The country here, though comparatively new to irrigation, is rich in resources. The community church idea is proof of a progressive spirit and past the experimental stage. Our present pastor is Rev. Asa Hall, M.D., living in Eaton, eight miles distant. He was formerly a missionary to China, compelled to return on account of poor health. A large practice as physician makes it impossible for him to do much pastoral work. He is agreed with us that we ought to have the service of an energetic resident pastor, to organize the community for the Master. You would do us a favor if you would advise us where an interdenominational, orthodox church may seek and expect to find the services of a loyal, devoted man, capable and worthy of leadership."

We commend this request to the consideration of our readers, some of whom may know of a good, faithful, experienced pastor who would be willing to serve this Colorado church. Write to Mr. Weiland, care of Mr. C. H. Lindberg.

Transforming the Philippines

WHEN the United States took control of the Philippines it undertook a very complicated task. For the people of the far-off islands formed a curious and extraordinarily complex group. About seven millions of the eight million people might, by a stretch of imagination, have been termed Christians; but, despite their advancement beyond the rest of their race, they were for the most part illiterate and superstitious. The remaining million was composed of utterly uncivilized tribes—people of whom the Negrito at the left of the page is an example. In contrast with him are the high types of Filipino young womanhood at the right.

History tells no story to parallel the achievements of the United States Government in the Philippines. It has turned savage brigands into officers of the law, it has made impassable mountain trails into good roads, it has brought culture and, in part, self-government to the people. The crude wooden plow drawn by the carabao, as illustrated at the bottom of the page, is being replaced by modern agricultural implements. And few of the schools are of the kind shown at the top of the page, for the best of American education has been carried to the islands.

In His Steps Today What Would Jesus Do in the Railroad World?

FOREWORD

IT MIGHT seem at first sight that a railroad was the last thing in the world that Jesus would care anything about. But that would be due to the fact that we might not understand the intense interest that Jesus felt about anything in human energy that had to do with the life abundantly.

And it is also true that perhaps no form of business in all the world has more to do at present with our modern happiness and even our existence than a railroad. If the railroads of this country should suddenly stop running, all the big cities would soon be in a panic, and starvation and ruin would stare them in the face. They are absolutely dependent on the railroads for their food and merchandise and commerce and mail and the every day necessities of life.

There is also probably no other form of human energy about which centers more of possible ethical and moral expression than a railroad. This is shown in the history of railroads and the tremendous changes which have taken place in the legislation which deals with the railroads as they have gradually evolved from a position where they at first dominated politics and received tremendous financial assistance from the government down to the present time, when the whole immense thing called a railroad is governed in very many important ways by restrictive laws.

There has been no attempt in this discussion to have Jesus indicate in specific ways the details of railroad administration. The one thing which He emphasizes is the great law of service which a railroad illustrates when it is performing its God-given mission in civilization. And also (for surely the Master in his contemplation of any form of human energy would not be in the position of a fault-finder and narrow-minded critic who could not see anything good) He would praise the self-denial and the wonderful holding to the day's duty which characterizes a great multitude of the railroad men of the world in their responsible places as servants of the general public. The attitude of Jesus towards the different forms of earth energy would not be that of one who could not see the beautiful and wonderful in men's actions. He certainly would not come today to destroy all the forms of civilization which were a part of the present age. Wherever there was good He would see it, and be as quick to praise as to blame, to encourage men for what they had done that was worth while as to condemn them for the omission of those tasks that were of first importance.

SEATED about the Conference Table the following: Jesus; the Directors; the Employees; the passengers; the Spirit of Progress; the Spirit of Service.

The Directors: We are in charge of one of the greatest forms of business known to civilized men. And it is far different from the railroad business of half a century ago. It is so different that many of us have forgotten some of the facts about railroads in the early sixties and seventies.

The Spirit of Progress: What were some of these facts?

The Directors: From the years 1850 to 1871 the National government gave grants to the railroads of 160,000,000 acres of land and gave the roads a special power of eminent domain in giving them the right to force the sale of property for their roadways. In many cases a virtual money grant was made to the railroads by the government.

The Spirit of Progress: This was a great power. What did the railroads do with it?

The Directors: They abused the power granted by favoring large shippers to the embarrassment and sometimes ruin of smaller business concerns, by a device known as rebates. And then, to stifle protest they showered newspaper men, lawmakers and courts with free passes. They had paid lobbyists in Washington and state capitals. They influenced legislatures, and were a factor in building up great monopolies. They formed combines and fixed rates that held commerce by the throat.

The Ninth Article in a Notable Series Discussing the Fundamental Problems of the Political, Economic and Social Life of the Nation

By CHARLES M. SHELDON

Author of "In His Steps"

The Spirit of Service: That sort of thing would spell ruin to all commerce in the long run.

The Directors: That is true. And as a railroad authority has said: "In 1887 the Federal Government enacted the Interstate Commerce Law; in 1897 the Supreme Court applied the Sherman Antitrust Act to railroads; in 1903 the Elkins Anti-rebating Law was enacted; in 1906 the Hepburn Rate Act virtually amended the original Interstate Commerce statute. Meanwhile, the various State governments have created railroad commissions and enacted regulating statutes. The State and Federal courts have also increased their scope of control."

The Spirit of Service: And yet even now, with all scientific safeguards and modern methods for protecting life, the toll of life is appalling on the railroads in this country compared with that of other countries.

The Directors: We are sorry to say it is. As for example in the year 1911, 10,396 persons were killed and 150,159 were injured on the railroads of the United States. In 1907 the number killed was 11,839, and the number injured 111,016. During the first three months of the year 1919 the total number of people killed was 1,601, and injured 11,844. (No figures are given for an entire year. If the same proportion held, the number of killed and injured on our railroads in proportion to the number of passengers traveling now as compared with ten years ago is far less.) But the railroads of Great Britain carry annually more passengers than ours in the United States and kill and injure far less.

The Spirit of Progress: Why is that?

The Directors: There are no grade crossings. There is a uniform system of railroad signals, which is not true of our roads. And the employees are not constantly changing, as ours are. Besides, the country is much smaller, and more care is exercised by the passengers and the general traveling public. For example, in the year 1915, when traffic was unusually heavy during the war in the carrying of troops, there were only 133 passengers killed, and 1,218 injured in Great Britain. The number of people carried in the year's time was 1,455,000,000, or nearly 400,000,000 more than were carried on the railroads of the United States in the same time.

The Passengers: How many people do the railroads of the United States carry in a year's time?

The Directors: In 1918 all the railroads of the United States carried 1,084,960,449 passengers. The figures for 1920 have not yet been made public, but they are about the same.

One of the Employees: According to the Directors' statement, in the first three months of the year 1919 only 93 passengers were killed on all the railroads. That is not a great number considering the great number carried. I am one of the engineers. There are more people killed every day owing to automobile accidents than are killed in three months on the railroads. (Over 700 in Chicago in 1920.)

The Spirit of Service: That is true. And besides, the railroad engineers are not to blame for the reckless drivers of cars who try to cross the tracks in front of the train.

The Engineer: I live on the edge of my nerves all the time nowadays on account of the speed mania of automobile drivers. I look out of my cab and see an automobile going along the road by the side of my track. I see the driver of the car speeding up just to beat me across the crossing. There is no reason why the man in the automobile should get across the crossing before I do, except the speed mania. I cannot very well turn out for the automobile and I am running on the company's time table and cannot very well be stopping my engine at every grade crossing when I see a car racing along the road. There is an accident and a number of people in the car are killed or injured for life. Am I to blame?

The Spirit of Progress: It is the speed madness of the age; sometimes called progress, but a travesty on my name.

The Employees: And some of the accidents on the railroads where employees are killed are due to lack of safety appliances or to faulty equipment. On one road during the first nine months of 1920, 26 employees were killed and the number of non-fatal accidents increased 44 per cent. over the year 1919.

The Directors: But according to a strictly impartial investigation of conditions on this very road only 3 per cent. of accidents to employees on all the railroads are due to faulty equipment. By the same impartial investigation 7 per cent. are unavoidable and unforeseen, while the remaining 90 per cent. are due to the fact that the men do not THINK.

The Employees: Our minds have been "out of tune" with our work, since the war. Many of us came back and returned to our old positions in a restless frame of mind. We are getting back to a better state of feeling, as we begin to realize the great importance of our work.

The Spirit of Service: Far more than the commercial or money-making power of a modern railroad is the human service it renders. No one can estimate that in dollars. Without the railroad in civilization, cities would perish for lack of transportation of food and necessities. Mail service would be reduced to the point of absolute confusion. Even with the lack of a perfect and adequate service as at present, no one can calculate what the imperfect system would be if cut off altogether. The carrying of friend to friend on errands of love and mercy; the service of Red Cross relief; the feeding of dying millions all over the world waits on the servant Steam and those who direct it, in the cab or the shop or the office or the Director's place of planning. The Master Himself must feel His heart beat with satisfaction at the sight of man's power working out mighty things for the happiness and general welfare of the world.

Jesus: I do. I came that men might have life and have it not meagerly, but abundantly. I rejoice in all that man does in his earth life to increase life's power.

The Employees: We do not have time, many of us, for church or religious devotion or the attendance on religious meetings. Behold us, an army, 2,000,000 in number. (As estimated by the United States Bureau of Railway Economics) on account of the peculiar nature of our work; confined to our duties, many of us, on trains of perishable freight, milk-trains, that must run on Sundays, transcontinental trains that can not stop moving on Sunday without throwing all the traffic into confusion. We have little time for religious life. How shall we cultivate, even when we want to, the spiritual part of our lives?

Jesus: By keeping in mind the tremendous service you are doing for the entire community. If you do your duty faithfully in speeding passengers on their errands of love and mercy and necessity, in feeding the children in the cities, in helping the great busy world to do its necessary work, you are worthy to have it said of you "good and faithful servant."

The Passengers: We have not always felt as we move safely and comfortably along how dependent we are on a great army of men whom we never see or know, who are watching out day and night for our train. If even one of these men in the train-service should forget, or be careless or thoughtless, our train would run into death's dark valley. We do not think enough of those who day after day and night after night and year after year are faithful to their trust, unknown and obscure, working in dangerous and unpleasant conditions, walking the tracks in winter storms, toiling at night between the maze of tracks that mark the yards of great city terminals, covered with grease and grime, bearing on their rough faces the marks of incessant labor—how remote they seem from our easy lives, from the softly upholstered elegance of our city churches where we attend with our friends—how impossible to think of these railroad men walking in to our morning service and worshipping the All Father while the surroundings are almost the exact opposite of their lives of dirty work. It makes us uncomfortable to think of these things.

The Spirit of Progress: Conditions in the business world can not be ideal. Business can not be run successfully that way.

Jesus: Do ALL THINGS to the glory of God. Until you men in business make that the rule of life, business will go on blundering and losing. The railroad business is not an exception to this divine rule.

Others of the Employees: Some of us find it possible to belong to churches and attend church services. On many roads the management is such that this is possible. It is a mistake to suppose that as a class, if we are a class, of labor, we have few religious privileges. It looks to some of us that the whole thing is a matter of the men's own choice, and use of the spare time which nearly all working men nowadays have.

The Directors: It is true that very many of the men on the different railroad systems are Christian men and church members. There are thousands of them who belong to the railroad Young Men's Christian Associations, and brakemen, firemen, freight handlers, engineers, train men and shop men find in these Associations great help to their spiritual and religious life. It is not fair to say that the railroad business shuts out men generally from religious privileges.

The Employees: Perhaps that is so. But there is a certain kind of work demanded in the railroad business that, in the nature of the case, on account of the special character of the labor, makes it difficult and sometimes impossible for the workman to command the leisure for all around development.

Jesus: All human energy must at last, when it is carried on in the spirit of real service to one another, recognize the universal right of every toiler to full development of all his needs. When that point is reached in the great business of a railroad, the carrying of it on will be like a great anthem of praise to God.

(Silence around the table. Broken at last by One of the Christian Employees): There is a magazine published on the road that I have worked for now more than twenty years, which is designed to put a feeling of dignity and responsibility into the minds and hearts of all the people who work for the road. It is an uplift to read its accounts of good work well done, to look at the wonderful pictures of the men in the different divisions of the railroad line as it crosses the country, and to know that a business that once existed to make money as its main object, now considers it to be a large part of its business to take an active interest in the physical and moral welfare of every person who is in its employ.

The Spirit of Progress: That is because the Directors have found out it is good business management to keep the employees feeling good.

One of the Employees: Just so. Business is slowly finding out the law that the Master has taught, that only as we do all things to the glory of God can we carry on business successfully. And nothing can be done to the glory of God which does not provide for the welfare of man.

The Spirit of Service: Railroads are not free from this law any more than individuals. Humanity grows confused over the size of commercial transactions. Big cities, big enterprises, big business, even the size of a railroad, are all under the working of the Master's rule of life. If they break that rule they are doomed to failure so far as real service to men is concerned, as the railroads in this country found out when they used their great power to corrupt politics and enter into conspiracy with rebates to favor selfish corporations. The evil was so great that the whole power of the Congress of the United States had to be used to put a stop to what was simply human selfishness on a bigger scale than usual. And at last the people learned that a human service like a railroad was too important to be given over unrestricted to private corporations, and legislation was enacted and made constitutional to restrain the railroads from running their business without regard to the public welfare.

Jesus: Men will find out in time that no human energy can take to itself any power and use it for itself without final destruction of the very power that men thought they were creating. They are working against a divine law which is as changeless and as inevitable as the tides of the sea. (Silence about the Table.)

The Directors: Some of us have known this law of service and have understood a part of its wonderful working, but some of us still carry in our minds the old pagan thought of self-seeking as the first law of life. If it is true that a railroad should do all things to the glory of God, just as much as an individual, is it possible for us to manage the railroads of this country so that the law of Jesus may have perfect expression? Is that possible, and if so, what would be the result if the law were to be generally obeyed? (They think it over.)

The Employees: According to Jesus, our labor is a labor of public welfare. Without us, the railroads of the world could not run. The hard, dirty, dangerous work that falls to us must be done by someone, and if we do it, our place in this wonderful piece of human energy is a very honorable one. Many of us think the wages paid for our work are not enough. Many of us still believe that capital and labor are natural enemies and that they always will be. Some of us now and then catch some glimpse of what the law of Jesus is, and we are happiest with our work when we know that we are necessary to the welfare of the public. Our place in the scheme of railroad affairs is not perfect, but we do not know of any other position in the world where the conditions are perfect. That fact ought not to make us unhappy or at war with the universe. If the Jesus rule of life can work out practically, we shall be glad to add our contribution to the general happiness and well-being of all who depend on our part as workers. (They think it over.)

The Passengers: We are the general public. Many of us are also the shippers of goods and merchandise over these roads. We have, as a whole, seldom given much thought to the wonderful skill and management necessary to make a railroad serve the public in a wholesome manner. Business ability of the highest order; physical courage and concentration of energy of the noblest sort, must be hourly expressed by the multitude of employees of the roads, from the engineers and firemen at the front end of the flying train, to the train despatchers and signal men and train men and yard men and the army of trained officials who direct the multitude of enterprises, that are a part of the entire intricate mechanism of the modern railroad. We wonder if the Jesus law of service and doing it all to the glory of God is practical and possible? If it is, a railroad is a divine institution capable of tremendous inspiration to the welfare of the world. (They think it over.)

The Spirit of Progress: I have sometimes taken a critical and commercial view of all business in which humanity engages. The standard which has interested me has been the standard of the dollar. Success had been measured by the income exceeding the outlay. But the law of Jesus is eternal, I begin to find out. It can not be broken without breaking the very essence of progress. He came to bring life abundantly, but THINGS alone do not spell that life. I wonder if the men who are conducting railroads on the basis of mechanical progress know this law. What would progress in civilization really be if the Jesus law were to be applied to so wonderful a thing as a railroad? (Thinks it over.)

The Spirit of Service: Blessed be the statesmanship of Jesus! The whole world will some time know that His wisdom is the wisdom that brings welfare to the human race. He came to bring men life abundantly. He rejoices in all the wonderful things that men do with the raw material which they take out of the earth and the air and the water to construct power. That which was unknown to His own day is none the less capable of serving His mighty purpose for the world's salvation. What triumphs of welfare for men will signalize the energies of men when all who labor and all who direct labor work together like one family for one and the same end? (Thinks it over.)

Jesus (Speaking to all about the table): Yours is a wonderful and interesting world. Power is a delight to the divine. And when power is dedicated to the public good and consecrated to the welfare of all, it has a dignity and a beauty that belongs to the eternal things. I came that men might have life and have it abundantly. And I am among you as one that serves.

(All at the table bow their heads. All catch a new vision of the word "service". And all ponder deeply over the Master's words as they try to interpret His meaning.)

Christian Workers in Conference

A NATION-WIDE Conference of Christian Workers with representatives present from every state in the Union and all parts of Canada, besides several from foreign countries, met in Chicago, February 1-5, and had its formal opening in the big auditorium of the Moody Church. Dr. James M. Gray, dean of Moody Bible Institute, sounded the call to prayer. He said "the rallying thought is 'they were all in one place in one accord,' on the first Pentecost after the Ascension of our Lord Jesus. There were devout Jews in Jerusalem from every part of the world. A large part of the world is represented here and we are seeking a Pentecostal blessing."

Rev. A. C. Dixon emphasized the great need for evangelism. Contact with leaders of religious thought in our own land and Great Britain has revealed that there is a widespread conviction that world needs can only be met by a genuine religious revival.

The laymen had a prominent part on the program. There were representatives from Baltimore, Des Moines, Grand Rapids, Chicago, and other cities who spoke on the practical and business side of the Church's work. All agreed in saying that through prayer and personal leadership men are led to Christ, and that the greatest joy of life came as the result of such work.

The spiritual care of the children is the paramount consideration of the Church at the present moment, said Dr. C. H. Woolston, of the East Baptist Church of Philadelphia. He told how for thirty-five years he had maintained a large junior congregation in connection with his church and had preached to a million and a half of children, using illustrated sermons. Forty-three of these children whom he had received into the church are now preaching the Gospel.

Need for More Prayer and Greater Faith Emphasized at Chicago Gathering

By LOYAL W. MADSEN

Dr. A. L. Latham of Chester, Pa., originator of the Summer Bible School as an antidote for the empty church and small prayer meeting, said that it has been so successful that last summer fifteen additional cities tried the plan, and the number will be increased to between fifty and a hundred next summer.

Rev. Otis G. Dale, D.D., a pastor with large experience among churches in all parts of the United States, spoke of getting results out of church work. "You must not over-emphasize the value of organization," he said, "nor underestimate its value. It is apparent that the churches that have not much spirituality will over-emphasize organization, while those with the zeal and fervor that win converts will frequently belittle its value. Remember that the Holy Spirit is the author of organizations that are real organisms."

MANY missionaries from foreign fields were present and gave messages from their experiences. They brought encouraging reports of their work, and also stressed the need of more workers and more money with which to carry on the work.

"A social, Bible-denying Gospel does not 'deliver the goods'," declared Dr. W. H. Griffith-Thomas, the eminent Bible expositor, formerly of Oxford, now president of Wycliffe College, Toronto, in speaking on "Teaching the Fundamentals." He formed this conclusion during a recent six-months' tour of the mission fields of the Orient. "The Gospel revealed in the Bible has the power to transform lives; but this evidence of the working of God was sadly lacking where destructive criticism had modified if not entirely changed the Christian message into a social gospel," he said. "The result of the entrance of destructive criticism on the mission field has been a cleavage. The Bible Union of China has been formed, as a bond of fellowship for those upholding the Word of God, and its members pledge themselves to bear testimony to the power of the Bible."

"Too many Christians are like a switch engine with the headlight on behind," Evangelist "Mel" Trotter told the Conference. "They are always looking behind, and wanting things done in the old-fashioned way. I believe we are going to have a great revival in this country and I am willing that God should send it in His own way. For a while after prohibition went into effect the bums were all gone and it looked as though the Gospel missions were going to have little to do; but they are all back again, not drunk, but out of work, and we have right now the greatest opportunity for soul-saving we ever had. The need today is not more churches, not more preachers, not more evangelists; not more missions, but more prayer and faith. On every hand, all sorts of expedients are being tried in the churches. When the church gets back to prayer and believing, Christ can do anything and we'll see devils cast out."

"I don't believe we will have the big tabernacle campaigns in the cities, in the coming revival; but rather that it will be hand-to-hand work on a large scale by believers, each one seeking to win others."

Beautiful Cities I Have Seen

The First of a Series of Fascinating
Travel Articles

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

AS I begin this short series of articles for the Christian Herald, on the most strikingly beautiful cities, lakes, mountains and rivers I have seen, I am impressed by my own temerity in attempting to write them, because I realize the truth of the sententious old saying, "tastes differ." Another traveler may pick out an entirely different set of cities, mountains, lakes and rivers, and call me to book for my poor taste or narrow viewpoint.

All I can say by way of self-justification is that I have seen many if not most of the great cities, lakes, mountains and rivers of the world, and shall attempt only to give my own opinion, admitting my fallibility, and allowing anyone who will to dispute my conclusions.

The most beautiful cities come first in the series I write, not of the largest, not of the most interesting, either historically or at the present day, but the most beautiful, largely by reason of their situation, and partly because of what man has done to beautify them. With these limitations I would name these four, Rio de Janeiro in Brazil, Budapest in Hungary, Geneva in Switzerland, and Stockholm in Sweden.

Each of these, like Jerusalem, is "beautiful for situation." For each of them nature has been prodigal with her treasures of landscape or waterscape. Most of our North American cities, especially on the Atlantic coast, mighty and imposing as some of them are, have flat and rather dull immediate surroundings and outlook. The approaches to New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Charleston are not imposing as is the harbor of Rio, nor does the Blue Danube divide them with palaces rising high on either bank, as it does Budapest. It must be confessed, too, that palaces are more picturesque than skyscrapers, even when the latter are fifty stories high.

To be sure, the Pacific Coast cities fare better for situation than those of the Atlantic Coast, and, if I had unlimited scope, I should mention San Francisco, Tacoma and Seattle, Sydney, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa, and others, in even a short list of "most beautifuls," but these cities have not yet had time to grow traditions and castles, and other material assets which must also be considered.

So I will stick to my four, let him differ who will.

RIO DE JANEIRO, all things considered, for the magnificence of its situation, and the good use man has made of this supreme advantage, I should place at the head of my list. As one enters the harbor from the Atlantic, he is impressed by the fact that the Creator Himself has done great things for the Brazilians in planting this city site.

Here is an extensive bay, locked in by towering mountains, through which no rude tempests can blow. So wide and deep is the bay that its discoverer thought it was the estuary of a great river, and called it the River of January, in honor of the month when he made the discovery. Yet the harbor is not so vast that the mountains on the farther side do not bulk with imposing grandeur.

There are the Organ Mountains, which soar into the blue sky like the pipes of some vast organ, and the "Finger of God," as it is picturesquely called in the Portuguese language, whose tip seems to pierce the clouds. There, too is Gavea, and, nearer Corcovado, which seems at a little distance to rise out of the heart of the city; and Sugar Loaf, thrusting its cone high out of the water, close to one of the most beautiful boulevards.

The granite embankments of the lovely esplanades are washed day and night by the rippling waves, while the mountains and lesser hills break the force of hurricanes and tidal waves, which have engulfed many tropical cities.

Such are some of the scenes on the seaward sides of Rio. Behind the city stretch unbounded miles of rich lands, scarcely equalled in fertility in any continent—vast forests of precious woods and millions of acres of coffee plantations, giving Brazil a practical monopoly of this fragrant berry.

By the way, I have just read that since prohibition became the law of our land, sixteen billion more cups of coffee were drunk by the American people in a year than in the days of the saloon. We will not grudge our South American cousins the prosperity that comes from North American prohibition.

Surely nature has done her best for Rio de Janeiro. But what has man done? If I had been writing about the city twenty years ago, I should have said, "Very little" and any traveler who has not been there since the early years of this century will be surprised at any panegyrics on man's part in making the "city beautiful."

A SCORE of years ago Rio was a pesthole, dreaded by ship captains because of the yellow fever that laid low their crews, and because of the difficulties of disembarkation, for there were no proper piers for ocean-going ships. The houses and business blocks were in the Portuguese style of architecture, well enough for cooler Portugal, but entirely unfitted for tropical Brazil. The principal streets ran just the wrong way for health, so that the cooling sea breezes could not blow through them. Suddenly there came to Rio's leading men a vision, and, with the vision, a transformation, until the artificial glories of the city came to correspond with its natural advantages.

Let me quote a few paragraphs which I once wrote while on board a steamer, immediately after leaving Rio de Janeiro, when its glories were fresh in my mind.

The harbor of Rio de Janeiro, locked in by towering mountains, forms a rarely beautiful setting for one of the world's great cities

"Where the great 'Avenida Central' now runs, there was until recently no street at all, just solid blocks of brick and stone houses, every one of which had to be demolished and cleared away before the street which I will pronounce the finest in the world, could be built. Think for a moment of the stupendous character of the task. In the way of the one central avenue alone were 590 houses and stores of all descriptions. These had to be bought, condemned and demolished. Nearly eight millions of dollars in gold were paid for them, taken-as they were at their assessed valuation.

"On the 8th day of March, 1904, the first house was demolished. One year, eight months and seven days later, on the Brazilian Independence Day, the Avenida was opened to the public. It is a mile and an eighth long, one hundred feet wide, lined with artistic buildings, many of them truly imposing and magnificent, though some are considered too florid and ornate to suit a severe taste.

"The sidewalks on which ten men can walk abreast are mosaics, in black and white flints, laid by artistic workmen, brought from Lisbon for the purpose. Down the center of the broad roadway are fifty-five ovals of flowers and foliage plants, with a Brazil tree (a beautiful shade tree) in the center. From each oval, too, springs an ornamental pillar bearing three are lights, and hundreds of gas jets beside, making the night as bright as day.

"Through this great avenue blow the prevailing, life-giving winds, by night and day, and into it pours the sunlight, purifying the city and greatly reducing the death rate.

"This avenue is only the connecting link between equally beautiful boulevards on one side joining the avenue to the new harbor works, a gigantic enterprise, and, on the other, stretching around Gloria Hill to Botafogo, a wonderful crescent-shaped bay, and then, on and on to the open Atlantic, under the head of mighty Corcovado

The Jewish Hope in Palestine

ALL over the world Jewish hearts today are gladdened by the intelligence that the first great step has been taken toward the realization of Hebrew hopes concerning Palestine. Never in all the centuries have they forgotten the promise: "Behold I will gather them out of all countries whither I have driven them . . . and I will bring them again unto this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely: And they shall be my people, and I will be their God."

Great Britain has accepted the mandate approved by the Supreme Council of the Allies at San Remo, the text of which clearly sets forth that the aim and object of British administration in the Holy Land will be to redeem the pledge in the Balfour declaration to promote the establishment of a Jewish National Home. In the mandate there is also the assurance that every encouragement will be given to establish the widest measure of self-government consistent with existing conditions. At the outset, however, Palestine will be in the hands of a friendly protecting power, which will impose taxes and customs duties, and will bring the new territory into friendly relations with the various nations of the world.

Some criticism has been made of the fact that Palestine is not to be immediately declared a free state. Such a course at the present time would be open to many serious results. The problem of the restoration of a people who have been exiles from the homeland and world-wanderers for twenty centuries is not one to be settled out of hand. The ancient country has just emerged from the long, despotic control of the Turk. Its Arab population is far in excess of the Jews themselves, and is not friendly to Hebrew control. Various problems, some already under way and others still prospective, relating to industrial and agricultural development, have yet to be carried out. To have handed Palestine over to the government of its own people before these and other matters have been well adjusted, and until the practicability of the experiment as a whole has been fairly demonstrated, would have been to invite disappointment and disaster.

Fortunately, the wiser way has been chosen. As the population grows and industries increase, local Jewish administration will be gradually brought up to a point where it can be relied upon more and more to manage its own affairs. Perils of agitation and exploitation must be faced and overcome. Premature action would only serve to delay such a program. It must be the task of the Jews themselves to demonstrate their ability not only to administer the powers of local self-government wisely, but to harmonize their difficulties and help to carry out efficiently the program for building up Palestine. With a population of less than 750,000, one-half of which is confined to the larger towns (a considerable portion of the remainder being nomads), there is room in the wide areas formerly devoted to agriculture for a population of more than ten times the present number. How far the Zionist movement will prove capable of aiding in the development remains to be seen. It has great possibilities, especially when we contrast the present showing of thirty agricultural colonies and approximately 12,000 workers, with the fact that Palestine, away back in Biblical times, supported a total population estimated at 5,000,000.

No one expects to see any general exodus of Hebrews from other lands to Palestine at present. Such a movement would not be advisable under existing conditions, and for a time immigration will be systematically regulated. But the future is bright with promise. Meanwhile, the prospect most clearly in view—the establishment of a Jewish National Home—should be fostered and aided by Hebrews in other lands, in order that it may stand as a signal on the heights, foreshadowing the greater glory yet to come.

As It Should Be

IT IS announced by the American Daily Standard of Chicago, on the authority of "those close to the President-elect," that under the coming administration the country will be dry—somebody with a passionate yearning for thoroughness has added: "as dry as a Sahara desert!" We don't know anything about the dryness of the Sahara, but it is good news that there is a prospect of Prohibition having a fair and full trial under impartial auspices. We should be a dry nation as long as the Volstead act remains on the statute books, and should it ultimately be subject to change as the result of thorough enforcement, we think it reasonable to assume that the change will be in the direction of rigidity rather than laxity.

President-elect Harding is a conscientious Christian citizen and one who would naturally, and without any outside pressure, incline to the loyal support of law and order. He may be depended upon to use all the influence at his command to give the Volstead act a fair field, which it has not had thus far.

Moving Toward Disarmament

HOWEVER much the leading nations may differ today on the various questions affecting world welfare that are now under consideration, there is one problem concerning which they may be regarded as almost in absolute agreement. Navalism, the mad and ruinous rivalry for sea supremacy, and the practicability of subduing it, is now under discussion in the American Congress, in the British Parliament and also in the Japanese diet. Indeed, it is becoming plain that Japan from the very beginning of the disarmament agitation has been favorable to a naval reduction policy which would include, as principal promoters, the Japanese government, England and ourselves. It is quite evident from the general tone of public opinion here and in Great Britain, and from the open declarations of official representatives in both countries favorable to naval reduction that the subject is one that is of supreme importance in its relation to national welfare.

Italy and France would be only too glad of the opportunity to follow the leadership of the three great naval powers in a strong reduction program. A naval building "holiday" of five years' duration, has been suggested, and it is not unlikely that a resolution to that effect may come up for action in Congress before the close of the present session, inviting England and Japan to join with us. No partial alliance, however, would sufficiently allay the evil. Every power, big and little, should be invited to unite in the movement in which either the United States or Great Britain must assume the lead—unless both should choose to act simultaneously. Such a step, whether taken in conjunction with the League of Nations or as a separate enterprise, would be welcomed by every land that has suffered through the war. The burden of huge naval expenditures in recent years has become intolerably oppressive. That burden would be lifted by a united movement under full agreement. Besides, the temptations under which strong nations irresistibly drift into war would be removed.

Our own national naval program includes the construction of fifteen battleships; that of Japan involves twelve of the same class, while the British plans—which they are ready to lay aside—contemplate building a number sufficient to retain the traditional "sovereignty of the seas." Each of these warships would represent an outlay of many millions of dollars. France's naval program is indefinite, and the fleets of Germany, Austria and Russia have virtually disappeared. Besides, it is a serious question whether the bombing airplane is not now sufficiently developed to fairly challenge the superiority of even the most formidable warship. And it should not be forgotten that the cost of a single warship would suffice to build a whole fleet of such airplanes.

We frequently hear it said that "the day of miracles is past." We do not believe it. The Almighty still directs world progress and the nation that works with a righteous end in view for the peace and well-being of all men alike, can safely leave the issue of such efforts in His hands. Today, the clear duty of the great nations is to show an example to the world by each fully trusting the honor and pledged good faith of the others, and not to regard them as rivals but as comrades in unselfishly seeking the whole world's good.

To Change—or Not to Change?

WE'VE heard, recently, that a certain lady—well known as a reformer—is trying to introduce a movement that will do away with the custom of a woman's taking the name of her husband when she marries. This reformer has a number of arguments in favor of it—chief among them being the argument that many professional women are today using their maiden names without the enactment of a law or any well defined movement. Perhaps the idea may be a good one—we may not be qualified to judge; but we can, at least, express an opinion. And this is it:

For a good many years a woman, when she marries, has taken her husband's name. Oftentimes it has been an unfair exchange—we have known countless Beauforts who have become plain Smiths; many Van de Veres who are now transformed into even plainer Jones—but the exchange has been an important one and a significant one, nevertheless. Marriage, if it is to be real and lasting, should be a constant state of giving and accepting—a giving of comfort and help and counsel, as well as of more tangible things; an accepting of failure and disappointment and responsibility, as well as the more pleasant gifts, like bracelets and fur coats. And it seems to us that the giving and accepting of a new name is beautifully symbolical.

Many professional women do, of course, keep their maiden names—as far as the public is concerned. But at home, and to their circle of intimate friends, they are plain Mrs. This and Mrs. That. And they are proud to be!

We can not help wondering how many engaged girls have spent many pleasant minutes scribbling the name-to-be on a bit of scrap paper. And we wonder how many brides have ordered their new visiting cards without a thrill of importance. And as for having C.O.D. parcels sent to Mrs. Peter Clark—well, it's bound to be exciting for a few dozen times, anyway!

It seems to us that the world has plenty of necessary work for lady reformers to do. There are still child-labor laws, and food profiteers, and jobless men, and diseases, and starving babies to take up the time of those who have time to give. Why not set a few of the most glaring evils and injustices right—instead of destroying a custom that, while it may have no real reason for existing, is both satisfying and beautiful?

Publishing a Christian Daily

Contributed Editorial by J. Clover Monsma, Editor of the American Daily Standard

WHEN the editor-in-chief of the Christian Herald wrote that famous book, "In His Steps," many years ago, and when in that book he stressed the great need of a Christian daily press in this Christian country of ours, he perhaps little thought that the first place where his noble ideals would be realized would be the busy, noisy, worldly metropolis of the Middle West.

And yet Chicago offered a better opportunity to start a publication of this kind than any other place in the Union. It is the nation's greatest distribution point. Hundreds of trains leave the city daily, going in all directions, and the service is as fast as you can find it anywhere in the world. Within a radius of five hundred miles, we can cover practically every city, town, or hamlet on the very day of publication, and the news is as fresh as that published in the hundreds of local dailies.

In addition to this fact it must be noted that Chicago is a center of political, social, commercial, and educational activities, and that we are in a position to secure first-class news and to secure it quickly.

The publication of the American Daily Standard, America's first Protestant Christian daily newspaper, was started last Christmas day, and we can say, with gratefulness to God in our heart, that we are winning, and winning fast. The Standard has the full leased wire news service of the United Press. It has an important foreign news service of its own, with correspondents in London, Rotterdam, Paris, Montauban, Berlin, Cairo, Shanghai, Honolulu, and Montreal. It has special correspondents in New York, Philadelphia, and on the Pacific coast, and a bureau of its own in Washington, D. C. A well-trained staff of reporters is taking care of the Chicago news.

The Standard is not only a clean and a truthful, but also a positively Christian paper. It believes that the time has come for the American people to return to the God of the fathers. This paper honors the Bible, and adheres to the old orthodox interpretation of the Bible truths. It is non-denominational in religion and non-partisan in politics.

The publishers of the American Daily Standard are profoundly convinced of the tremendous importance of the daily press in the shaping of characters, homes, and nations. They believe that Christian people have not kept abreast of the times, by failing to make use of an instrument which today is more potent and influential than either the school or the pulpit.

The American people are crying for a great national paper that will publish the truth, that will interpret the events of the world in the light of Christianity, that will be clean and wholesome, that will be so Christian and so pure, that not a single line is found in it which the most exacting parent would hesitate to let his boy or girl read.

We are trying to make the American Daily Standard such a paper.

The House That Was Not a Home

A Neighborly Story

By IDA M. KIER

Illustrated by M. L. Greer

"GOOD-BYE, Miss Carson."

I turned around so quick that I nearly dropped the dish I was wiping. I knew who it was that spoke; but I had not heard the child come up on the porch. Something strange for a boy to be so quiet, too; but it was just Benny Ware's nature to be so.

I can see him yet—standing there and looking at me through the screen door. His face was the solemnest I had ever seen it, and his dreamy blue eyes were misty. I saw he was dressed up; which meant, for Benny, a fresh white waist and tie, blue serge knee pants, shoes and stockings, and a cap in place of the wide-brimmed straw hat he had been wearing. He held a flower-pot in his hands. I knew well enough what was the matter.

"Land sakes!" I exclaimed, and wiped my hands on the dishcloth. I was so flustered. "You're not going right now, Benny?"

"Soon as the van comes. We're all packed and ready. I thought I'd run up and tell you good-bye and give you this—'cause we can't take it with us." His voice sounded queer; and as he set the flower-pot down he touched the geranium leaves caressingly with his finger-tips. It was truly a fine plant. I had given him the slip and he had just seemed to make it grow.

"I'll keep it for you," I said; "and now I'll run right down to see your mother. I never thought about you moving before evening."

I got my sunbonnet and we started. Benny ran on ahead of me. He was seven years old and the finest little lad of that age I ever saw. I lumbered along behind him as fast as I could, but I'm getting rheumatics even in my middle age, and weighty, too. I can't walk spry like I used to.

"It's a shame that they have to go!" I stormed to myself as we went along.

THE house where

Benny and his mother lived was a little piece from mine. I always called it "the house that was not a home" because no family ever lived there long enough to get settled down good. The principal reason for this was that it was so far out, the main town being across the river. It was the only place for rent in our suburb, and dear knows the number of families it had sheltered in its time. In the dozen years that I had lived by it—after I got my legacy from home and bought the house on the hill—I couldn't begin to keep track of all the people that had moved in and out. I got acquainted with some of them; some I never knew at all.

But it was different with Mrs. Ware and Benny. They had moved there eight months before, and the first time I ever set eyes on that little chap was when he came to my door and asked to buy a nickel's worth of milk. I filled his bucket full of good milk—it hadn't been skimmed, either—and gave him back his nickel and some red apples. He thanked me like a little gentleman, then looked at my wood-box and said: "May I get you a load of wood?" I saw that he wanted to pay for what he got, so I let him get the wood. And from right then Benny and I were friends.

What a help that boy was to me that fall and winter! He came up every day and carried in my wood and water, hunted the eggs and fed the chickens and pig. How I was going to get along without him another winter, I just couldn't see. I gave him milk and eggs and butter and red apples; though I had to be careful about giving them things, for Benny and his mother were not the begging sort. They had a way about them which said plainly that they'd rather do without what they couldn't earn. And Benny paid, by doing chores, for all I gave him.

I knew before I ever saw Benny's mother that she would be worth getting acquainted with. I could tell that by her son. And she was indeed the finest little woman! My heart went out to her on the spot. She and Benny were all alone. There was only a small income left by her husband, and what she added to that with her needle was all the two had to live on. I suspected that she had a hard time making both ends meet; but she was not one to air her troubles, and whatever hardships she endured, she never complained.

She had moved into the "house that was not a home," because the rent was cheap; and then it was out and away from the crowded town. They had lived there longer than any other family had ever stayed, when Mrs. Ware received a notice that the place was sold. She was all broken up over having to move. I was, too, for that matter, but I didn't let on to her half how bad I felt.

I FOUND Mrs. Ware sitting on a trunk that was all strapped. She jumped up and got me the only chair that was not tied to something else. Everything was as Benny had said—"packed and ready."

"It seems to me," Mrs. Ware said earnestly, "that the grandest thing on earth would be to own a home—not to have to move."

"I didn't know I'd hate to leave so bad," she said presently; and her voice quavered a little. "Somehow we are attached to this little place. It has seemed like a real home to Benny and me; so quiet—like out in the country."

"I'm vexed because that man sold it," I said speaking real coarse to keep my voice steady. "To think that when somebody got here that did try to make a home and want to stay, they should be turned out!"

"I'm sorry to leave such a good friend and neighbor as you have been, Miss Carson," she went on. "Benny cried last night after he went to bed because we have to move away. He wanted so much to help you with your little chickens this summer."

"It's a shame that he can't," I cried, "after he helped me set all the hens! They'll hatch in another week—and he won't be here to see 'em." I had to stop and gulp something down in my throat before I could finish. "I aimed to give him Old Speckle and her brood, though I hadn't told him. I wanted to surprise him—"

"He'd have been so pleased," Mrs. Ware said in a trembling voice. "He's never had anything like that of his own."

I couldn't speak for something in my throat. I got up and went out of doors, and she followed me. The little yard, covered with new spring grass was real pretty; and despite rough usage, the house looked sound and neat. Walks, fence and out-buildings were sadly in need of repair. Their destruction was the work of rough children and careless grown folks who had lived there in summers gone by.

Mrs. Ware was looking off towards one corner of the garden where a cluster of plum trees covered with white, waxen blossoms were gently waving their branches and filling the air with perfume; and if there's anything that smells better than plum blossoms—well, I've never smelt it.

"I love the plum trees," she began, then stopped real sudden.

"We were going to have the garden plowed right away," Benny said wistfully, "but now—" he stopped, too.

"Here's a bench that Benny made," Miss Carson. It's real handy. Would you care for it? I'm afraid we won't have room to take it. One always has to leave something behind when they move."

"A person never knows how much they have till they go to move." I had heard that old saying and repeated it before I thought.

"It seems to me," Mrs. Ware said earnestly, "that the grandest thing on earth would be to own a home—not to have to move."

I LOOKED up the hill at my house. It made a handsome showing, with its white walls and green roof. But I had never realized until that minute how thankful I ought to be for it. That poor little woman's remark made me see how little most of us who have homes appreciate them.

I thought once that I couldn't bear to see them go; then I couldn't bear to go and leave them. So I was there when the van came. Two strapping men loaded all the things in a jiffy; and as there was plenty of room left, one of them kindly told Mrs. Ware that she and Benny might ride, if they wished. So he fixed them a seat on a box.

I never say good-bye when I can help it, so I told Mrs. Ware to come to see me, and she told me to come to see her; and we both said we would, and we both knew we wouldn't; for she was moving to the far side of town, across the river and a good many miles away. I never get that far away from home to visit, and I knew she never went anywhere, either.

I wanted to say something cheery to Benny and tell him to come some time, but just as I opened my mouth to speak he said "Good-bye, Miss Carson," so sad and lonesome-like that I couldn't have spoken then to have saved my soul. I just waved my hand and stood there like a dummy. They drove away, and I suppose they thought I didn't care a bit because they were gone.

But as soon as they were out of sight I went right back to that empty house and sat down on the step and cried my heart out. Of course they never knowed it, though; and that's just the way with me. I can't show my feelings before others, so people think me hard and unsympathetic.

After my cry was over I was angry—angry at the owner of the house that was not a home. Why couldn't he have let Benny and his mother stay there?

I started for my own home at last, carrying Benny's bench; and I felt sure then that I would never go back to the place again. When I reached my own gate I turned and looked back. The little house looked awfully lonesome—just like it missed Benny. The dilapidated out-buildings and broken fence appeared desolate and forsaken. The blooming plum trees in the garden formed the one real patch of beauty. But the location is good, I told myself; and if everything was fixed up, it would make a cozy home. Somehow, since my talk with Mrs. Ware, the word "home" had come to have a deeper meaning.

THE new owners of the house that was not a home took possession next day. There were four in the family—father, mother, and two grown daughters. They did not wait for me to call on them. One of the girls came to my house the next day to borrow sugar!

The Soul's Search for God

A Sermon by REV. E. V. COLE *

TEXT—Acts 17:23. "I found an altar with this inscription, To The Unknown God. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you."

PAUL had come down to Athens for a little season of rest, but he found the Athenians so idolatrous and, in spite of their culture, so ignorant of God that his spirit was stirred in him and he was compelled to break forth again into evangelism. He gathered a congregation on Mars' hill and took for his text an inscription which he had found on one of their altars: "To The Unknown God."

The Athenians knew all the gods except God. He was the unknown quantity to them. They spent their time in nothing else but to hear or tell some new thing. It is possible to be in the very presence of God and yet not recognize Him. Philip said to the Master, "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us." And Jesus replied, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." These Athenians had been living in the midst of a thousand-fold manifestations of God's presence, but "their eyes were holden" and they had not seen Him.

Now, I think a careful study of Paul's sermon will reveal the fact that it falls into four divisions. That is to say, Paul points out to these purblind Athenians the fact that God had made a fourfold revelation of Himself to them, but they had missed Him at every point. And now let us in imagination take our stand among these Athenians and listen to the argument which he makes.

First of all, God has revealed Himself in His created works: "God made the world and all things therein." God has written His signature across everything that He has made. The world and all things therein are a revelation of Him. Every blade of grass, and leaf of the tree, and dewdrop, and flower, and rain-cloud, and mountain gorge, and sunset splendor tell of Him. The earth, with its rotation of day and night and succession of summer and winter, speaks of Him. The regular visitation of seedtime and harvest speaks of the great provident Heart who has a care for His hungry children. The heavenly bodies that move with such clock-like precision through the boundless spaces manifestly move according to design, but you can not have design without a designer.

You can not have creation without a Creator. Back of these starry skies there is a Master Mind that revels in their beauty and warms His heart in the starlight of these works of His fingers, that sparkle with such matchless splendor all through the night. When you next take your journey to the office or store or field, look about you and see how every foot of the way is eloquent with the declaration of God.

IN THE next place, Paul calls attention to the fact that God has revealed Himself in the history of mankind. "He hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation."

When we look for God in the history of the human race, we find manifold signs of Him there. He directs the affairs of nations, not in the sense that He can be held responsible for everything that men and nations do; but He overrules the movements of humanity in the larger sense, so as to bring about the accomplishment of His purposes. "My Father worketh hitherto and I work," said Jesus. God is never idle. He has been at work from the beginning in the history of the race.

"He hath made of one blood"; this is the solidarity of the race. "And hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitations"; human speech could not any more plainly declare the divine intervention in the movements of the race. Speaking of history as it appears in the Bible, Bishop Marvin has said: "But the events of history, as they appear in the Scriptures, serve only as a vehicle. To note and narrate them is not the object of these writings. They are used for a great purpose. They are charged with a message to man. They bear a burden. They are laden with a word—one word—God!"

I am inclined to believe that these words might be applied with about equal force to all history. Indeed, it is altogether probable that we make a mistake when we attempt to divide history into two sections, sacred and profane. All history is under the watchful eye of God. All the great mass movements of the race are paralleled by His footprints.

At the beginning of the World War, somebody asked a great churchman who would win the war? His reply was, "Who won the San Francisco earthquake?" I reckon he meant that if there was anything to be won out of the war, God would win it. It is a unique thought and one we do well to lay away for reference. As we read the history of mankind and note the tragic fate that has marked the end of every nation that has forgotten Him, we can not escape the conviction that God was in it all, and that "these things happened unto them for examples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come."

The third place where God had made a revelation of Himself, but where these Athenians had failed to find Him, was in themselves: "We are also His offspring." It was exceedingly obnoxious to Paul that these Athenians had so far forgotten their divine origin as to imagine that they could fittingly represent God with a "stone graven by art and man's device." That was the thing that had stirred him up. Why, a statue, except in outward appearance, doesn't fittingly represent a man; how can it then be like God? Its eye doesn't kindle; its lip doesn't quiver; it thrills to the surge of no emotion; it doesn't long for the touch of a vanished hand. These things belong only to the offspring of God. And so it is that man, in all his God-given powers, is a revelation of God.

IT HAS already been said that the heavens declare the glory of God. Man, too, declares His glory. When we look about at the vastness and magnitude of the created universe, we are awed by its splendor and magnificence, and we are likely to forget that God expressed His fondest care and His dearest hope in the creation of man, when He said, "Let us make man in our image." The Psalmist walked out under the open sky on a starlit night, and was so impressed with the vastness and wonder of it all, that he went back into the house and wrote a song with this refrain: "When I consider the heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him?" In other words, the question which had arisen in his mind was, Can it be that God, who created these vast heavenly bodies and these boundless spaces, has any time or inclination to notice man? "Why, certainly," answers Paul, "for we are also His offspring." A positive statement!

It is indeed a witless soul who has never stood under the open sky on a starlit night, and felt himself shrink into an atom. But take your stand under the shadow of the Cross and see the Son of God, as He holds back the curtains of death long enough to save a thief, and then you will see these same heavens "fade away as a scroll." There is a sense in which a man is dwarfed as he stands in the presence of the created universe; but there is another sense, and it is the immortal sense, in which the value of the soul dwarfs the universe, and dismisses even the moon and the stars to the dustheaps of time.

These Athenians had failed to find God in His created works; they had failed to find Him in history; they had failed to find Him in themselves. But they might now find Him in Christ, and that is Paul's final appeal: "God hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead." Paul seized upon the resurrection as being the thing most likely to startle and challenge the attention of these Athenians, "who spent their time in nothing else but to hear or tell some new thing." And so it did; for some of them mocked, and some believed, while some said, "We will hear thee again of this matter."

The Spirit of Lent

By BISHOP JAMES HENRY DARLINGTON

LENT has a double vision, in that we keep our eyes on the sufferings of our Lord and Master, and also on our own life course, and try and follow His example. Lent is a time of multiplied church services. The Church is Christ's bride and she has the right to call upon us for a tithe or tenth of our money, and as the Hebrews thought, one-seventh of our time.

The greatest mistake about Lent is that people who have never observed the happy season of forty days look upon it as a time of sadness and not of gladness. This year, we have been celebrating the three-hundredth anniversary of the Pilgrim Fathers, and one incident I learned in the life of the Pilgrims gives us a suggestion as to how Lent is to be observed. The Pilgrims lost by death over half of their women, and a large proportion of their men, in the first year they spent in America. On one frosty morning when the winter was coming on, one of the leaders, greatly discouraged, said: "God has forgotten us, or is angry. We must repent of our sins and fast in sackcloth and ashes. Let us proclaim a fast day, and pray God, if perchance His wrath may be turned from us, and that He will be gracious to us, and bring the promised help in supplies and more people from England." Another man, more wise, replied: "Let us indeed spend the day in the worship of God, but let it be a day of thanksgiving for mercies vouchsafed, and not a day of complaint or tears. Let us put an 'e' in the word, and make it a feast and not a fast day. We have garnered sufficient root crops, Indian maize and fuel to last us all winter, and the water from many springs satisfies our thirst. The Indians are peaceful, the sea and the rivers full of fish, while the woods are filled with turkeys and deer for food." His motion was carried; and Thanksgiving day has spread almost all over our nation.

George Herbert begins one of his well-known poems "Dear Feast of Lent"—and to those who truly believe in God and love God's Church, it is a time of both spiritual and bodily refreshment. The outside world makes quips and jests about its reality, because no one appears to be sorrowful or sad, but solemnity is not piety, and dyspepsia is no part of religion. Our Lord said: "When ye fast, be ye not as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance . . . but thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head and wash thy face, that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret."

If this is so, why have a special time, and why not live so close to God that there will not be need to draw near to Him, at a stated season? The answer is evident. There is a time for merrymaking, but that time is surely not during the six weeks when such social festivities will interfere with regular church attendance.

We are told in Holy Scripture that "they that seek me early shall find me," and when Ash Wednesday calls a halt in the social world of late entertainments, and advises parents and children to gather early in their church homes for instruction and worship, it is good for the health of body, mind and soul that the Lenten call be heeded.

Of course, family gatherings on Sundays and week days, music, lectures and friendly visiting are encouraged; but the call of Lent is to say "No" to all that savors of dissipation; and to say "Yes" to the call to give up evil habits and start better ones in their places.

Dear friends, no matter to what church you belong, try to make use of Lent to your own building up in "God's most holy faith," or at least let me plead with you not to make sport of, or tease any young Christian who is trying, through Lenten discipline, to get nearer to God. Lent is helpful to many, and I do not see how it can hurt any one to try in this way "to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."

TO PAUL, the resurrection is the "proof text" of the Incarnation. It validates everything else, and with it stands or falls the whole Christian system. It is the crowning act of God's revelation of Himself in Christ, and it stands in such vital relation to the faith of the individual believer that, "if Christ be not risen from the dead—we are still in our sins."

The revelation which God has made through His Son still remains, and ever will, the wonder and glory of all His dealings with men. No mind has yet plumbed the depths of the glorious fact that the Word became flesh and dwelt among us. But we do not have to understand the mystery of the revelation of God in Christ in order to appropriate its benefits. "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." And so the whole matter, so far as you and I are concerned, resolves itself into a question of simple, childlike faith in the risen Christ, who is the complete and final revelation of God. Through Him God hath given assurance unto all men, and through Him we have the hope of immortality planted in our own hearts.

Would Bill-Board the Decalogue

A TIMELY suggestion for advertising moral teachings is offered by R. H. Sherwood, Watervliet, Mich., in the following letter:

"I am a reader of your paper, and enjoy it. The reading is profitable and instructive, and it is a good paper to have on the library table for all to read."

"There seems to be a demand for some scheme that may bring about better citizenship. It is preached from the pulpits and advocated in our secular papers. There must be some practical effort along this line."

"We have commercial advertising and bill-boarding of everything that is for our material needs or for recreation. We talk morals, civic reform and every kind of 'uplift' which pertains to the outside of mankind. Why not advertise and bill-board THE TEN COMMANDMENTS? It is the real sentiment embodying everything for 'good citizenship.' If there is anything in advertising, it certainly would command attention. People must be made good from the inside out!"

The Real Kings and Priests

SUNDAY. Rev. 1:5, 6. "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever." There is a marvelous range in the ministry of these words. It begins in a very low and defiled spot on earth and it rises to the splendor of our Father's house in glory. About thirty years ago a series of little biographies was published telling the lives of famous men who had been born in mean circumstances and had risen to places of eminence and power. "From Log Cabin to White House"; that was one of them, and it told the wonderful story of Garfield's life. It is the range of things that fascinates us. Children are captivated as they watch the passage of Cinderella from the kitchen to the Prince's palace. But here is something far more wonderful. It is nothing less than a transition from a gutter to a throne. Men and women who had lost all signs of sovereignty are made kings; and men and women, who had lost their purity, are changed into priests. Those who were once clothed in carnality are now clothed in royalty, and they walk about as the friends and kinsmen of God.

The very setting of the passage seems to offer some suggestion of its meaning. There is, first of all, a prelude—"Unto Him that loved us." And there is a postlude—"Unto Him be glory and dominion." And between the prelude and the postlude there is a matchless work of grace, a miracle of moral and spiritual transformation. Or shall we say that at the beginning and end of the great passage, we have the formative forces of the divine love, and glory, and dominion; and in the midst of them we have the wonderful thing which is being formed, even a spiritual King and Priest, and he is being formed out of most unlikely material and in most incredible conditions.

First of all, then, we begin with the divine love. That is the beginning of all beginnings. That is the alphabet, and out of this alphabet is woven all the marvelous literature of redemption. "God so loved the world!" That is the eternal fountain, and without it we have no grace at all. For God's love is not vague sentiment, or a mere niceness, or even something sweet and transient as a fragrance. "God so loved that He gave"; it is living which expresses itself in giving, and which so expresses itself continually. "That He gave His only begotten Son"; it is not only impartation; it is impartation even to the limit of uttermost sacrifice. God's love proves itself, not in external gifts but in the gift of Himself.

And what is the ministry of such wonderful love? "He washed us from our sins." Love wages a crusade against the unlovely. It seeks our redemption from the bondage of all that is unlovely. Our souls are in servitude to sin. We are like birds which have been caught in bird-lime, and whose wings and feet are glued in bonds which they can not escape. And God's love washes the lime away; not bits of it, but all of it, until we can rejoice in the glorious liberty of the children of God.

But love not only cleanses us, it raises us. It confers upon us high prerogatives and corresponding endowments. It makes us "kings"; it crowns us with the grace and gift of self-mastery, conveying to us sovereign rights over our own powers, and it names us lords of circumstance and destiny. And love makes us "priests." Ours is the prerogative of intimacy with God, the right of entry into the Holy place, the blessed privilege of being able to go in and out and find pasture. Ours is not the spirit of bondage again to fear, but the spirit of adoption whereby we cry, Abba, Father!

The Authoritative Word

MONDAY. John 5:39. "Search the Scriptures." The word for "search" is ereunato, the same that is used of a hound on the scent of a quarry, and determined to find it. Now, here is a Book that claims to be the authoritative Word of God. What shall we do with it? The least that can be expected is that we shall approach it as we would any other book; that is, without prejudice. How does a man read Dana's Geology or a volume of Macaulay's History? Does he begin by assuming that it can not be relied upon? On the contrary he assumes its truth until he has found something within to discredit it.

The trouble is that in these controversial days, when men imbibe their views of the Bible from its enemies, they read it with a preliminary conviction that it is a mingled tissue of truth and falsehood. What can God reveal to a man with such a hoodwink over his eyes? I do not believe that anybody can read the Bible with a mind divested of prejudice and open to conviction without concluding that it is a trustworthy compendium of truth and the veritable Word of God, as it claims to be. D. J. B.

The Ministry of Revelation

TUESDAY. John 24:48. "Ye are witnesses of these things." The world needs "sermon in shoes" and "living epistles." The work of our life from the viewpoint of the Gospel imperatives is that we reproduce Jesus. Christianity is the reproduction of His life in us. Christianity is not a creed or dogma or ritual or polity, but a life. Whoever produces this life—the Christ-life—in its spirit and purpose, and loves God and fellow-men, is a Christian.

The passion of the early followers of Jesus seemed to preach and work that "Christ might be formed" in people. "The best evidence for Christianity is a Christian," said Henry Drummond. The best test is the fruit test. "Believe me for the work's sake," said the Master.

A woman succeeded a certain man on a mission field, where she heroically sought to impart to the natives' minds the majesty and beauty of the personality of Jesus Christ. She was amazed to see how readily her audience grasped the details of her message. One of them said, "Miss Sahib, we know Him well, for He lived here many years." The life of her predecessor was bearing fruit. The most successful and persuasive presentation of Gospel truth comes with the preacher's or teacher's complete immolation. As God's licensed fishermen in all waters of humanity, we need the constant prayer and preparation that will fit us for this task. To be a witness of the Gospel values and truths is at once a privilege and an opportunity for the expressing of life in the highest terms, for the greatest good of the greatest number. It is a task that takes all of a person all of the time to po it justice; but it is the highest task that ever challenged the consecration of earnest men and women. The only reason why we venture into all the world to preach the Gospel is that the Master of all the world gives us the strength to do it. It is not a lonely task, but a shared task. R. B.

God Constantly Revealing Himself

WEDNESDAY. Jere. 6:16. "Ask for the old paths, the good way, and walk therein." Nature's atmosphere, sunlight, ocean and electric power, are always the same, perfect gifts of God. Love, growth, beauty, melody are also elementary, unchangeable blessings. We study, utilize and appropriate the Creator's wonderful productions, but there can be no change in the laws governing the universe; they are complete as the Giver. The Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount are as staple today as when delivered. We get new views of God's eternal principles, new kaleidoscopic combinations, but it is on the human side that improvement is made.

Moses, Isaiah, David and Paul, who never looked through a telescope, listened to a phonograph, or spoke through the telephone or wireless, wrote, inspired by the Infinite. We know that His Word is truth, that He will never give a second Bible to His children, for the old in His kingdom never becomes fossilized. The revelation of God to men ended when John laid down his pen. The stars may fall, the sun be blotted out, but God in Christ lives on forever.

We may need new applications and specialization of Bible themes, but universal uniformity reigns with the Most High. On the rock of truth the soul finds security, safety, finality and everlasting happiness. Here we should rest in Christ forever. E. W. C.

Choosing the Best

THURSDAY. Phil. 4:8. "If there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things." In Boswell's life of Johnson, he says that he once asked that great man whether he had ever been inclined to turn aside from literary pursuits, and received this answer: "Yes; once I thought of learning to play the flageolet; but after taking a few lessons, I found that it would interfere with my work; because if I played the flageolet at all, I must play it well. Therefore I gave it up."

It behooves us ever to choose between the greater and the less. Love, duty, character, usefulness take precedence of crowns and fortunes. A man who had swung around the circle of life and found the right place of emphasis, was moved to say, "I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, my Lord—that I may win Him and be found in Him—that I may know Him and the power of His resurrection!" To find the highest and best—in other words, to bring truth and righteousness into proper relations with everything else—this is to make life tell! This is to glorify God! D. J. B.

The Gospel of the Knee

FRIDAY. I Thess. 5:17. "Pray without ceasing." Prayer has been known to change things. Just how, we do not know. If we did know, we would have no need of prayer, for we would be equal to the power that does the changing. The fact of answered prayer is unquestioned; the philosophy of the fact is beyond us. What we need is the demonstration and not its explanation.

Prayer is to our Christian life what the sun is to the harvest. It ripens our individualities into fruits of the Spirit. Prayer is to the Christian what breath is to the lungs. It is the breath of God that vitalizes the life. The more prayer the more power; the more power the more potency. We may omit many things in the propaganda of the faith, but never prayer.

In the Solomon Islands, there is a class of native dogs that suffers from chronic starvation. They have but little spirit, and when they take hold of anything, it is not a difficult task to make them let go. A missionary told the natives how the bulldogs, when they take hold, will die almost before they will release their grasp. A native teacher speaking on "Prevailing Prayer," prayed after the lesson, "O Lord, make us bulldogs in prayer." Such indeed are the intercessors needed today. "I will not let Thee go until Thou bless me." Persistent, prevailing prayer will work the miracles and redemption marvels of the twentieth century. R. B.

The Usher of the King

SATURDAY. Luke 3:4. "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make ye ready the way of the Lord, make His paths straight." It was no ordinary office John the Baptist was called upon to fill. He was the immediate usher of the Christ, and Jesus Himself spoke of John as "the friend of the Bridegroom, who rejoiceth greatly to hear the Bridegroom's voice." In a sense John was Christ's "best man." Virtually his message was, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh! Go ye out to meet Him." It is no easy task to straighten out crooked paths, to clear underbrush, to cut away briars and to remove thorns for tender feet. This was his mission—to open up avenues by which the Christ might reach the hearts of men.

And it is our work in a very real sense. We are messengers of the King. He has come and is here. But the way is not straight. There are crooked paths in men's thinking, and out of crooked thinking issues crooked dealing. The world needs Christ and does not know it. All the while Christ seeks men that He may be their perfect Saviour. This is our message: "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin, and cureth the ill, and healeth the hurt, and beareth the burden of the world." It is not for us to alter or amend the message. The King cometh. He is at hand. C. C. A.

The World News of the Week

Germany Accepts Invitation to London Reparations Conference

THE defiant tone with which German officials received the reparations program drafted by the Allied premiers in Paris, was dropped in the reply which the German Government sent to Premier Briand, of France, as president of the Allied Supreme Council. Germany's foreign minister had announced that the Allies' terms were so severe the government would refuse to consider them; but the German reply accepted the invitation to attend the Reparations Conference in London, now set for March 1, "provided the negotiations are based on proposals which the German Government reserves to itself the right to lay before the conference." There was no attack on the Allied proposals, and Premier Lloyd George, of Great Britain, already had promised in a speech that the Allies would give fair consideration to alternative proposals by Berlin.

After four days of heated debate, the French Chamber of Deputies gave a vote of confidence to the Briand ministry, 387 to 125; and the Paris agreement was approved by a vote of 395 to 83, with many deputies refraining from voting. Party leaders attempted to exact from Premier Briand a pledge that in no circumstances would he permit the London conference to reduce the indemnity total. He avoided this, asserting that the Versailles Treaty was a dead letter, and France's only hope of collecting anything from Germany lay in maintaining the entente with the other Allies, even though that involved concessions. Any considerable modification in the reparations terms will bring a fight for the overthrow of the Briand cabinet, with former President Poincaré, an advocate of drastic action against Germany, looming high among his possible successors.

An important development was the announcement that at Paris the Allies had decided to reduce to $60,000,000 a year the expense to Germany of the Allied occupation of the Rhine. This meant a saving of $300,000,000 a year, a sum almost equal to that which was expected the 12 per cent. tax on German exports would yield.

Disarmament Resolution Opposed

THE Senate Committee on Naval Affairs has scrapped Senator Borah's resolution for a naval holiday, but the movement for disarmament has continued to advance steadily. The committee, in answer to the Borah resolution, declared the United States should maintain a navy at least the equal of that of any other power; that the battleship and dreadnought are not obsolete as the result of aerial and submarine development, a point on which there is much controversy; and that it would be unwise for this country to disarm since universal disarmament has not been established.

Sir Auckland Geddes, the British Ambassador, is returning to Washington with full powers to press proposals for a world conference on disarmament, according to the London press. Such a declaration caused no surprise in Washington, for it was known that his recall to London for conferences with Premier Lloyd George was concerned chiefly with the disarmament proposals and that the British Government was ready to participate in such a movement. The British Ambassador will be ready to discuss this question authoritatively with Mr. Harding immediately after his inauguration. Representative Butler, chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, announced that he knew the nations would be invited to send representatives to a disarmament conference in the United States after Mr. Harding took office. In the Japanese diet a resolution for reducing the naval armament was defeated, 245 to 38.

Congress made good its determination to reduce the American army to 175,000, by overriding President Wilson's veto of the joint resolution ordering such action. In the Senate the vote was 67 to 1 and in the House 271 to 16. Secretary Baker at once ordered the cessation of recruiting, but it was expected nine months would be required to reduce the army to the figure required. The Army appropriation bill, as passed by the House, carried the sum of $329,000,000 and provided for a force of only 150,000 in 1922.

Plea of Railroads Denied

THE Railroad Labor Board has denied the appeal of the railroad executives for the immediate abrogation of the national working agreements and the setting aside of the basic wage rates for common labor. The existing agreements, which the executives have assailed as involving a needless expense of $300,000,000 a year, will remain in force until they are modified. A new code drafted by the Board is substituted.

It was announced that the roads would proceed individually to ask for conferences with their unskilled employees over wage reductions in order to bring the wage controversy again before the Board, and wholesale applications by the roads for wage cuts were planned. The Board's action was based on the ground that the railroad executives' pleas of impending bankruptcy belonged in the province of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has jurisdiction over railroad finances.

A HUGE ADDITION TO AMERICA'S AERIAL FLEET
The Italian dirigible, Roma, 410 feet long and the world's second largest semi-rigid airship, has been purchased by the War Department for $200,000. It has a cruising radius of more than 3,000 miles.

A measure designed to ease the financial situation of the railroads by permitting them to obtain partial payments under the federal guarantee clause was passed in the House by a viva voce vote and was sent at once to the Senate, where efforts were to be made to expedite it. About $300,000,000 was due to the railroads from the government up to the end of September but no payments could be made because of the provision of the Transportation Act that the railroads must render a full accounting before receiving any money—a process which might require a couple of years.

New Immigration Bill Planned

THE Senate Committee on Immigration has rejected the immigration bill passed by the house, prohibiting the admission of aliens for a period of fourteen months, and has begun the drafting of a measure based on a new principle. It is that of limiting the number of persons of various nationalities who may be admitted in any one fiscal year to five per cent. of the number of persons of such nationality resident in the United States, the percentage to be based upon the census of 1910. This would make possible a maximum immigration in one year of 592,436.

Such a principle for regulating immigration has been advanced often in recent years, particularly as a means of limiting Oriental immigration without resorting to racial discrimination. A table prepared by the committee showed that under its proposals 128,000 from the United Kingdom, 125,000 from Germany, 83,000 from the old Austro-Hungarian state 86,000 from Russia, and 67,000 from Italy could be admitted in any year; and that 337,000 of the total immigration would come from the northwestern European countries.

MRS. HARDING READY FOR THE INAUGURAL
In preparation for next week, when she will become "the first lady of the land," Mrs. Harding indulged in a shopping tour in New York. This picture was made at that time.

Four of the nine Senators at the committee's session favored the House bill and prepared to submit a minority report, so that the Senate will have a chance to reverse the committee's action. It was not expected that action on the new bill would be possible at this session or that the House would agree to drop all the drastic provisions of its measure.

SMUTS WINS IN SOUTH AFRICA. Adherents of General Jan Christian Smuts, prime minister of the Union of South Africa, won a decided victory in the general elections, and the premier was assured of a working majority of twenty in the Assembly. The chief issue in the election was that of secession from the British Empire and the advocates of secession, previously the strongest party in the Assembly, suffered a severe reverse.

SCHOOL SYSTEM FOR PALESTINE. British officials in Palestine have outlined plans to provide education for all children in Palestine except those belonging to the nomad tribes or living in remote districts. The villages will be asked to provide buildings, and the government will undertake the expenses of maintenance.

BRINDELL SENTENCED FOR FIVE YEARS. Robert P. Brindell, long dictator in the New York building trades, was sentenced to a term of from five to ten years in prison for extorting $5,000 for ending a strike. Trial of John T. Hettrick, a lawyer, on a charge of coercion in connection with his activities as organizer of a "code of practice" among building contractors, was begun.

MR. HARDING BUSY AT ST. AUGUSTINE. Warren G. Harding was spending in St. Augustine, Fla., the last weeks before his assumption of the presidency and was busy conferring with party leaders, attending to a great mass of correspondence, and writing his inaugural address. He received many appeals to include in his cabinet, General Leonard Wood as Secretary of War and John Hays Hammond, as Secretary of the Interior.

THIRTY KILLED IN GEORGIA CYCLONE. Thirty persons were killed and forty injured by a cyclone which wrecked the village of Gardner, Ga., and swept bare a five-mile strip in the vicinity. Most of the victims were negroes.

NEW AMERICAN CARDINAL PROBABLE. Predictions are made in Vatican circles that at the next secret consistory, to be held early in March, the Pope will appoint a new American cardinal. It was expected that Archbishop Dougherty of Philadelphia would be selected.

IRISH REJECT HOME RULE ACT. A large conference in Dublin, held under the auspices of the Dominion League and attended by representatives of all sections of Irish moderate opinion, refused to lend support to the Home Rule act in southern Ireland. Only three votes were cast in favor of the act. Resolutions were adopted demanding full national self-government with financial independence, limited by an agreement for safeguarding the strategic unity of the British Isles.

COTTON AND WOOL DUTIES INCREASED. Amendments to the Emergency Tariff bill increasing the customs duties on cotton and wool were adopted by the Senate. Adoption of the cotton amendment by a vote of 36 to 12 was interpreted as a sure indication the bill would pass with a large majority.

EIGHT KILLED IN NITROGLYCERIN EXPLOSION. Emmett Bunyan, a school teacher, and seven of his pupils were killed near Lawrenceville, Ill., by the explosion of a can of nitroglycerin, which one of the boys had found and, ignorant of its contents, had tossed to a playmate.

JAPANESE "AGREEMENT" STILL TENTATIVE. Secretary Colby, in reply to a request of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations for a copy of the agreement between Japan and America on the immigration question, announced that progress had been made but that no agreed text existed which could be given out without tending to defeat rather than to aid a settlement.

China Famine Sunday Observed Widely

All Faiths Join in Heeding Appeal for the Starving

EVIDENCES of the widespread effect of China Famine Sunday, on February 6, in stimulating interest in the efforts of the Christian Herald and other agencies working for the relief of the starving in China, began to come in to the Christian Herald office immediately following the observance of the day. It would appear from reports so far received that the hopes expressed in these columns previous to the event were more than realized, and that February 6 was set aside by thousands of churches of all denominations throughout the country as a day for special prayer and special appeals in behalf of China's starving millions.

An especially gratifying feature of the observance was the way in which all faiths consented to join, each in their own churches, in marking the day. Protestant, Catholic and Jewish leaders alike made special appeals to their clergy to ask for spiritual and temporal aid for the famine victims. The following statement was issued by Dr. Robert E. Speer, President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, on the eve of China Famine Sunday:

"The response on the part of the churches throughout the country to the request that February 6 be observed as 'China Famine Sunday' has been more than generous. Leaders of practically all the denominations represented on the Federal Council have officially endorsed the idea and have sent out a nationwide appeal to the pastors of their respective churches to set aside tomorrow as a day on which the pitiable sufferings of 45,000,000 famine-stricken people in the northern provinces of China may be impressed on the hearts and consciences of their congregations. Appeals to the generosity of American Christians will be made from thousands of pulpits throughout the country and it is certain that the appeal will not be in vain. American church people have never failed yet to respond generously to the cry of suffering humanity, and they will surely not fail now."

SIMILARLY, the Rt. Rev. O. B. Corrigan, of Baltimore, representing Cardinal Gibbons on the American Committee for China Famine Fund, gave his formal endorsement to the idea of China Famine Sunday and appealed to Catholic clergy to join in its observance.

Jewish congregations were invited to help by setting aside Saturday, February 5, as "China Famine Sabbath," in a letter by Lee M. Franklin, of Detroit, President of the Conference of Rabbis, addressed to the 250 members of his organization.

It is too soon, as we write, to be able to say anything as to the pecuniary results of China Famine Sunday, though it is expected these will be large.

Tangible evidence that the hearts and consciences of Christian Herald readers are deeply engaged in this great work continues to come in in the form of contributions to the Christian Herald fund.

Last week we announced a grand total, up to February 2, of $415,716.78. The daily record of contributions for the succeeding week was as follows:

February 3	$3,271.76
" 4	2,303.62
" 5	2,707.77
" 7	6,569.60
" 8	3,421.26
" 9	2,919.58
Grand Total	$436,910.39

By Skyer, in Philadelphia Evening Ledger

A gratifying resolution adopted by the Christian Herald Committee in Peking, and signed by its chairman, P. C. Leslie, M.D., has been received at the Christian Herald office by a recent mail. The resolution reads:

"That having been called together as a committee to administer funds raised through the efforts of the Christian Herald we do hereby express our profound thanks to Almighty God, who has raised up this instrument of His, to promote relief among the millions of North China now suffering from the worst famine in the memory of this generation; and we gratefully acknowledge the splendid efforts of the Christian Herald in the beneficent effort it has now launched.

"It is hard to realize the need, hard to estimate what is required to relieve this need, but the committee appointed cheerfully undertakes to make disbursement of the funds committed to it with a view to relieving suffering and preserving life, while at the same time safeguarding the confidence placed in it by the Christian Herald and its generous contributors."

The Christian Herald Committee now is working with all the other missionaries in distributing relief forwarded through the American Committee for China Famine Fund.

ANOTHER letter recently received, from Mrs. J. Goforth, who with her husband is laboring to relieve suffering in Southern Honan, speaks of a meeting of the Famine Relief Conference at which Dr. Leslie "in a hush that could be felt" stated: "There is no human possibility in sight to carry the worst sufferers straight through."

Mrs. Goforth closes her letter, however, on a note of optimism which we are glad to pass on to our readers. "In closing," she says, "let me give one bright glint in all this dark picture. Already we see that good has come out of this calamity. The highest Chinese officials of the land are seeking help of the Christian missionary. Missionaries and Chinese leaders are working together in one common cause. There could be no better proof given of the sincerity and loving purpose of the missionaries than just this famine relief. There is no doubt at all but that a very wide door into the hearts of the Chinese people will be opened as a result of this terrible famine. The Chinese all over the country, high and low, know how missionaries are spending, without stint, strength and money to save their people."

Contributions for the relief work may be addressed to the Christian Herald China Famine Fund, Bible House, New York City.

Jesus Among His Friends

International Sunday School Lesson for March 6. Matt. 26:1-13

By LUTHER DENNY WHITEMORE, Litt.D.

AMONG the striking contrasts in which the life of Christ abounds, none is more impressive than that suggested by the two scenes briefly, yet vividly, described in the verses which are specified for today's study. At the very moment, apparently, when the Sanhedrin, the supreme council of the nation, having decided to destroy Jesus, was planning the manner in which the deed could be accomplished without provoking a demonstration by the people, Jesus, under the shelter of a hospitable home and surrounded by His friends, received a never-to-be-forgotten tribute of love and loyalty. With exquisite literary art the writer relieves the tension of the reader's feelings by introducing this tender incident in the narrative which moves on irresistibly towards the climax; and Jesus Himself, after the strain to which He had been subjected, must have been refreshed in spirit by a manifestation of devotion so unmistakably sincere.

Jesus in private life. The life of Jesus, after His public ministry began, was so full of action that the record of His private life during His brief career is only fragmentary. An occasional glimpse of His personal relationships is all that is permitted, and much is left to imagination and conjecture. He had no home in the sense in which we understand the term; but He loved children and attracted them to Himself, taking little children in His arms and blessing them. He was a welcome guest in the homes of His friends. In the home at Bethany, where Martha served and Mary sat at His feet and heard His words, He was among His friends as nowhere else. His life was literally given, not on the Cross alone, but every day, to the single purpose for which He came—to reveal the Heavenly Father and to win men to His own ideals.

Jesus at Bethany. The scene at Bethany in the house of Simon is one of the few intimately personal incidents in the story of Jesus' life. How real the situation seems! and how lifelike in comparison with the most thrilling of the parables, in which the characters are only creatures of the imagination! The purpose of a parable is, of course, not to relate facts as such; and the events described are not important in themselves, but in the suggested teachings.

But the anointing of Jesus at Bethany was not a parable; and, although the example of Mary is contagious, the purpose of the writer was not primarily to arouse the reader to imitation, for that specific act could not be repeated, but rather to present the scene in its simple beauty and thus to add one more element in the portrayal of the character of Jesus—His appreciation of a friend's devotion. Beautiful in its conception and in the doing, the act of Mary is like a masterpiece in art, a thing of beauty which stays perpetually in the mind, and which is, as Jesus said it would be, a memorial of her who did what she could to comfort her Lord and Master and to prepare Him for the ordeal through which He was to pass.

Jesus' life was filled with ministry for others, and the occasions were rare when others ministered to Him. Perhaps He seemed so strong and self-sufficient that even His friends failed to realize that He needed them; but woman's intuition prompted Mary to offer her costly gift, which was not waste, as some regarded it, but worship. In this act there was no trace of selfish calculation. Mary brought to Jesus the most costly of her possessions, perhaps all that she possessed, and used it lavishly. There was no thought nor expectation of the extraordinary commendation which Jesus uttered.

In this incident, so full of appealing sentiment, there is one discordant note, the interjection of the mean and commonplace—"Why this waste?" But how fine was Jesus' answer! In it was implied a whole philosophy of religion. He spoke of Himself almost impersonally, or as another might have spoken of Him. The two great commandments are both involved, and observance of the first and greatest is not a hindrance but a help to the observance of the second. Hearts that are most responsive to the love of Jesus are most responsive to the needs of men.

Doing for Jesus. It seems almost superfluous to point out specific applications suggested by the anointing of Jesus, for love like that of Mary will always find a way for beautiful expression. We may, however, mention some of the thoughts awakened by the contemplation of this memorable scene.

No one who appreciates what Christ has done for him can fail to feel an impulse to do something in return; and if Christ were here among us, how we should prize the privilege of doing something which would please Him! But Jesus Himself has told us how we may show our love for Him. First, we may on all occasions, manifest our personal loyalty; then, we may minister to the ever-present needs of those about us, giving food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, hospitality to the lonely, clothing to the destitute, comfort to the sick, and companionship to those whose misdeeds or infirmities have brought social isolation.

The poor are not only those whose poverty is most conspicuous, but those who need love, companionship, understanding, or appreciation. No one lives who is so independent that he does not need something which another can supply. Even the Saviour of the world, who did not personally lack food or clothes or shelter, gave His chief commendation to her who poured out the precious ointment upon His body in preparation, as He said, for His burial.

In the economy of God there is a place for beauty. The world itself which God has made is beautiful. The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth His handiwork. He created plants, not only for food, but to adorn the earth. The greatest artists can only imitate, and can not approach, the beauty which God has made. Becoming action is also beautiful and Godlike; and the men and women who habitually do things fittingly are benefactors no less than those who provide food and clothing for the poor. We need to be reminded over and over that our life does not consist in the abundance of the things that satisfy the animal appetites, but in the capacity for loving as God has loved us.

TEPECO Water Closets for Every Place and Purse

PERHAPS it will surprise you to have us tell you that there are different kinds of water closets, for they have probably all looked alike to you and the subject is one in which delicacy restrains too great a show of interest.

But the subject is important, since the health of the entire household may be undermined by a poorly constructed water-closet outfit. A shallow water seal may permit sewer gas to escape into the room, permeating the whole building. A lack of water surface may constantly leave soil adhering to the surface. A constricted trap passage may clog with the inevitable hurry call for the plumber. Or perhaps you cannot tell whether the tank is of china, as it should be, or some other material, liable to stain or leakage. Again, the tank fittings may be the kind you've been used to in the past—frequently getting out of order, replacing rubber balls, floats and washers. So many things can happen!

There are four principal types of water closets. Some manufacturers make only one or two of them. Some make them good and some indifferently. Tepeco makes them all, and sanitary engineers tell us we have eclipsed our competitors. Being manufacturers of all types we are free to frankly tell you which is the best and the next best.

We have named each of the leading types, priced them F. O. B. Trenton, and you can be governed by these prices for comparisons. We lay no claim to attempting to turn out the cheapest water-closet outfits, but we do say they are the nearest thing to permanency you can buy, and we believe it will pay you to specify them.

If you intend to build or renovate be sure to send for the new edition of our instructive book, "Bathrooms of Character," Edition J, together with a book telling the features of the different types of water closets.

Young People's Topics for March 6

Thy Kingdom Come—In My Church

C. E., and B. Y. P. U. Matt. 6 : 7-15

READ the reference over and over until the words of the Master Teacher have imprinted themselves on the heart. You are a member of the Church of which Jesus Christ is the Head. In the light of his teachings ask yourself these questions:

"How can I best serve in the Church in order to make it more efficient as a force for righteousness?"

"How can the young people's society contribute toward that efficiency and as a member of the society what may I do?"

"If every Church member were just like me what kind of a Church would my Church be?"

The following may not be good poetry but it is good logic pertinent to our individual relationship:

"Real Churches are made by folks not afraid,

Lest somebody else gets ahead. When everyone works and nobody shirks,

You can raise a Church from the dead.

"And if while you're saving your personal soul,

And can help save your neighbor's too,

Your Church will be what you want to see,

It isn't your Church—it's YOU."

The strength of the chain is the strength of its weakest link. Individual effort makes for collective beauty.

This is Consecration Meeting. Let the members repeat in unison this vow: "I have solemnly promised when I joined the Church, in the sight of God and men, to advance its interests by my faithful attendance, by reading the Holy Bible, by never neglecting its ordinances, by contributing to its support, by joining in prayer and praise and by rendering service to my fellow-men whenever and wherever the opportunity presents itself. That promise I this day renew before God my Father, Christ my Redeemer and the Holy Spirit my Sanctifier."

The Golden Whirlpool

E. L. Jer. 22 : 13-15. Hab. 2 : 9-14

STUDY the first reference and you will detect a criticism against selfishness. Study the second reference and you will detect the same protest in the words "Woe to him that coveteth." Study the Bible from cover to cover and you will learn that the selfish life is contrary to the law of God. God's law is the exponent of love, because "God is love." Jesus Christ, the perfect revelation of God, was Love Incarnated. Christians are therefore to be the living examples of the love doctrine, the golden rule, the square deal and co-operation.

The Christian life is characterized by giving, not getting. It demands that we manifest thought and endeavor for the other persons with whom we come in contact. The strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak. The wise ought to help the not so wise. The rich ought to feed the hungry. The world is learning the beauty and power of helpfulness, as witness the multiplied charities and innumerable organizations of benevolence. He truly walks in the steps of Jesus Christ who does the most for his fellow-men. The Church, individually and collectively, is the organized compassion of God.

"Any municipality can coerce men into charity. We need the Lord for the creation of philanthropy. The poor law system may compel us into giving, but in the gift there may be nothing of the fervor of a passionate good-will. How can we get cold charity converted into radiant philanthropy?" The answer to this question is: "He loved me and gave himself for me." "We love because He first loved us." There is no logical reason for the existence of the poor and needy in the world so long as the Christian Church is in existence.

Admitting Things

WHEN we were naughty way back in our school days—when we were saucy to teacher, when we passed notes, or whispered to each other, or did any other of the annoying things that children do in school—we were usually punished by being sent out alone to a dreary room known as the cloakroom. I remember it well—for I was sent there many times—as a gray, narrow place with a large variety of coats and mackinaws and jackets hung in soldierly rows upon wooden pegs. There were no windows in the cloakroom, there were no books or pictures to divert the young mind from the ways of repentance. There were not even any chairs—the small sinner was forced to stand in a corner and contemplate, silently, the empty, accusing coats.

One stayed in the cloakroom for varying lengths of time. Sometimes for ten minutes, only, one stood in the corner and wondered at the ways of life. But sometimes a child would stay in the cloakroom for the whole of a school session. And sometimes a child would even stay past the session and suffer the disgrace of being "kept in."

The punishment, in the first place, was meted out—and justly—by the teacher. But the length of the punishment depended upon the child, and upon no one else. For the child was only obliged to stay in the cloakroom until he was sorry—and was willing to admit it. The child was only forced to stay in the dim, narrow room until he was ready to tell his teacher, in front of the whole school, that he realized his mistakes.

Always, when I was forced to spend time in the cloakroom, I was very soon sorry. Always, after five minutes of self-judgment, I knew, in my own heart, that I was being justly punished. But I have stayed for over an hour in the cloakroom tearfully trying to screw up my courage to the point of a public confession. I have gone, more than once, to the door—and have hurried back to the shelter of the room with its empty coats that had no eyes to watch me with, and no ears with which to listen.

As a child I found it easy enough to be sorry. I bitterly regretted my small mistakes, I shed many a salty tear over my apparently unavoidable naughtiness. But I found it hard to admit to outsiders, as readily as I would admit it to my own soul, that I was wrong or naughty. I found it hard to confess, even though I knew that forgiveness would rapidly follow my confession!

I READ a story, yesterday, in a certain magazine—the story of a woman who had been the unwilling accessory to a crime. She had had no real part in the wrongdoing—she had only played the rôle that is often a disastrous one, the rôle of innocent bystander. When she learned, through the newspapers, the real meaning of events that had puzzled her, she was appalled and startled. And then the horror of the situation confronted her, and she felt the clutch of panic's hand.

At first she contemplated confessing her part in the affair. She admitted to herself that she had acted foolishly, and without sound judgment—that she had been the tool of unscrupulous people who were cleverer than she. But as the panicky sensation grew she decided that she would not tell her part in the affair. She argued to herself that she had been blameless; that she had only used poor judgment. And she told herself that it would be humiliating to confess to the authorities that she had been silly.

It was all right to realize her own deficiencies, all right to admit, to herself, that she had been unwise. But she could not admit to other folk those things that she knew to be true. She was afraid to face their almost certain feeling of contempt, their equally certain ridicule. And because she would not admit it she laid the foundation of one of the most baffling mysteries in the world of crime—a mystery in which she, later, became terribly involved.

You'll Find Them Easier to Face if You're Not Facing Them Alone

I OFTEN think, as I look through the daily papers, that there are doubtless many crimes that could be solved if some person were willing to face the notoriety and—perhaps—the laughter of the multitude. I often wonder what sort of a world we'd have if more people were willing to admit to others those things that they do not hesitate to tell to themselves.

I have known a good many professional people—artists, poets, and writers—who, though they know that they turn out good work, refuse to admit it. They know that they are satisfied with what they have accomplished and yet, to the outsider, they display a false modesty. I have asked a good many people, point-blank, whether they thought that they did good work and to date only one has answered me, frankly, and said:

"Yes, I do think that my work is good. If I didn't think so, I wouldn't do it!" Only one, out of many, has answered me so, and yet I am sure that many of the people who have answered less honestly would bitterly resent a well-merited criticism from an outsider.

IT'S the hardest thing in the world, almost, to admit one's faults. And, curiously, it's almost as hard to admit one's virtues. All alone, in a silent cloakroom, admissions come easily, but it's a very different matter when the world—or some portion of it—is looking on from the sidelines. It's even hard, sometimes, to admit one's failings and ambitions to one's own mother.

But it is not hard to tell a certain Someone all the doubts and the troubles, the failures and the successes. That's something to remember. And that Someone is, always present, always ready to listen to confessions—be they the confessions of a small repentant child, or of a hardened criminal. That Someone is waiting, with an infinite tenderness and a boundless patience—waiting with loving hands outstretched in compassion.

With loving hands outstretched! That's the thing to remember. The Someone that you should confess to, the Someone that you should talk to, as easily and simply as a child talks to a friend, is not waiting coldly to pass judgment upon you. He is waiting in the silence, with an understanding that is so deep that no explanations are necessary.

One Easter morning two angels rolled a stone away from a tomb. And when we come to God with an admission a like miracle takes place in our hearts. For the angels of confession and of the Peace that follows confession will roll away the stone of guilt.

Take your confessions and your admissions to Him! And you'll find that it's no harder to tell things to Him than it is to talk them over with your own heart and your own conscience. Perhaps that's so because He is, after a fashion, your own heart and your own conscience. Take your perplexities to HIM and, after you've told Him all about them, you'll find that it's not nearly so hard to go to the rest of the world and admit that you were wrong, or naughty, or silly. Maybe the rest of the world, as far as you're concerned, is your teacher, or your employer, or some member of your family. Maybe it is a court of law. But no matter who or what it is you'll not find it so difficult to face when you're not facing it alone.

Perhaps it was because we were afraid, as children, that we stayed in the cloakroom. Perhaps it was because we more or less gloried in our naughtiness—which I doubt. But perhaps, and I think this is the most likely reason, we stayed because we didn't want to go out alone. And perhaps now, with the day of cloakrooms past, we're often afraid to go out alone. It's a comfort to know that we need never, really, be alone!

Rod-shaped bacteria in the presence of the oval yeast plants as seen in a solution under the microscope

Notice how the bacteria has disappeared from the same solution three days later. The presence and growth of the yeast plants have made it impossible for the bacteria to live there.

Why the familiar cake of Yeast Foam is now eaten as well as used in bread

Many "run down" people are benefiting from the new use of this common food

Yeast—a remarkable protective food that prevents the growth of disease germs

DO YOU know why people generally are so susceptible to sickness just at this time of year? A "run down" condition, lowered vitality, lessened bodily resistance, due to unhealthful living, overwork, worry, fatigue, exposure, unbalanced food, permit attacking disease germs to overwhelm the watchful and protecting white corpuscles of the blood, and the other natural defensive forces of the system.

When the disease germs get into the body a struggle follows to see which shall overcome the other. The cells of our bodies usually succeed in resisting and overcoming the disease cells, except in mid-winter when so much of human vitality is directed towards maintaining the normal healthful temperature of the body, and because of the absence of certain healthful green foods.

A vigorous condition of health is the best protection against contagion, because by the right kind of living, by keeping ourselves at a high level of physical fitness, the body produces its own powers of destroying disease germs and eradicating other poisons from the system.

One of the dramatic discoveries of modern medicine is that nature intends the familiar yeast cake to serve mankind through its peculiar ability to repair and upbuild the disease destroying powers of the body, and restore such conditions of the system that nature has a chance to apply her own remedial forces.

When you feel "below par" and the body is below normal in energy and vigor, living particles, known as germs, microbes, bacteria, always present, reproduce themselves more rapidly than ever, but not so when the yeast cell is on guard. The presence and growth of the marvelous little yeast plant makes it impossible for harmful bacteria to live in the same place, the yeast cells eventually outnumbering and destroying the pernicious bacteria.

This is why thousands are creating vitality and resisting disease by eating Yeast Foam.

For "run down" condition

Many people, not sick enough to be in bed but ambitionless, languid, out of sorts, always tired, irritable, suffer from a "run-down" condition that racks their whole system with distress without knowing just what causes their inconvenience or just what to do to obtain lasting relief.

You may eat bountifully, but still the kind of food you eat may be the cause of the trouble. It isn't the amount of food you eat that makes you strong, healthy and fit. It's the selection of the right foods—those that contain vitamins, the recently discovered health-giving, disease-resisting element, lacking in most of the things we eat. Vitamins are four times as abundant in yeast as in any other food.

Yeast Foam stimulates the whole system and renewed appetite, energy and vigor result. Like any other treatment it must be persisted in for four or five weeks to be effective.

How to take Yeast Foam

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals. Some prefer to eat it plain and wash it down with a little water or milk. Others take a bite of yeast and a bite of cracker, or eat it buttered like a cracker. Some carry a package around with them so a cake can be eaten at convenient times.

Choosing Furniture for the Home

WITH the approach of spring come thoughts of house-cleaning, and the storing away of articles that are associated in our minds only with winter. Also comes the planning for a few new pieces of furniture that the whole family has been looking forward to enjoying for a long time.

Probably no type of furniture has ever been made that is so entirely satisfactory and inexpensive as the kind that is known as "mission furniture." Its simplicity of design, its freedom from ornament and gingerbread work, makes it popular in the small home, because it does not collect dust and so the unnecessary time or labor is consumed in keeping it clean and tidy.

As it is made in a variety of woods the finish of mission furniture varies from a light green to a dark brown stain, and so can be made to harmonize easily with almost any simple color scheme. Also, because of its simple straight lines of construction, it may be introduced without any jarring effect into almost any room with furniture of other styles.

Although the rocking-chairs seem clumsy looking, until you grow accustomed to them, they are very comfortable. The tables designed for the sitting-room cannot be equalled for solidity, and make very good-looking pieces of furniture as well. The dining-room chairs are also sturdy and can be depended upon not to become "wobbly" because of much use by the children. No more comfortable piece of furniture can be imagined than the leather-seated mission davenports, and while these are not so inexpensive in themselves, they are the best value for the money that can be obtained for a living-room—where this piece of furniture is used constantly.

For a contemplated spring addition to the furniture of either the dining-room, sitting-room or bed-room, no mistake can be made through choosing a piece of the mission type.

Parties for Children

A CHILDREN'S party should always be arranged along very simple lines, with plain dainties which are easily prepared. Any holiday in the year is an excuse for a children's party, which may be given very successfully indoors, with the proper decorations. It is well to lay your plans some time in advance. The number of guests should be limited to about a dozen, if the children are under ten.

For patriotic occasions, crêpe paper caps should be provided for them, and the color scheme should be a combination of red, white and blue, with small flags for favors. Games and singing afford the entertainment, and story telling on patriotic themes by a grown-up amuses the children of a tender age.

A Jack Horner Pie is most effective. To make one a large pudding-pan is necessary. Place a napkin in the bottom and fill it with little trinkets which have a patriotic significance, fastening to each one about half a yard of red, white and blue baby ribbon. Cover the pie with white crêpe paper, making a small hole in the top for the ribbons to come through, and cover the outside of the pan with red paper. Paste and trim with rosettes of red, white and blue baby ribbon. Slit the top of the pie into as many wedge-shaped pieces as there are guests, cutting it from the center almost to the rim of the pie. Place a paper rose in the center and fasten a card with the child's name at the end of each ribbon. Just before they leave the table the children all pull together and each extracts his gift from the pie.

Jelly nut sandwiches are delicious for part of the menu for the party. They are made by putting a half a pound of nuts through the food chopper, beating up a glass of jelly in a bowl and spreading thin slices of buttered bread with the jelly, sprinkling the nuts on it and covering with a second thin slice of bread.

When hot pour it into a rather shallow baking-dish, brown in a moderate oven, and serve at once.

COOKIE ICING

ful or two of catsup or chili sauce, and a little mayonnaise. Use brown or white bread, and add a lettuce leaf when spreading the sandwich.

CREAMED COD ON TOAST
Place a small package of codfish in a piece of cheese-cloth. Dip it into boiling water, then in cold, and squeeze very dry. Then make one and one-half cupfuls of white cream sauce, add the fish and three tablespoonfuls of finely chopped parsley. Heat to the boiling point and then lift onto thick slices of toast. Pour a tablespoonful of butter over the fish when ready to serve and garnish with a strip of nicely browned bacon.

TOMATO JELLY SALAD
Soften two tablespoonfuls of gelatine in one-half cupful of cold water. To one can of condensed tomato soup add a can of equal size of hot water. Bring to a boil, adding salt, pepper and a bit of sugar if liked. Remove from the fire and add the softened gelatine, and stir until dissolved. Pour into small molds moistened with cold water. When the jelly is set remove from the molds and serve with a cream dressing.

BAKED EGGS WITH RICE
Chop one cupful of cold ham fine and mix it with one cupful of cold boiled rice, add salt and pepper and one tablespoonful of butter. Put into greased muffin tins, and on top of each carefully break an egg and put into an oven until the rice is thoroughly heated and the egg is set. Remove from the pans and serve on small hot individual plates. If there is danger of cooking the egg too much; heat the rice and ham first before dropping on the egg.

The Use of Molasses

MOLASSES is very rich in lime so that it is a good bone builder. It also contains acids and minerals that are helpful for the up-building of the system. It should be used a very great deal in the preparation of meals, because of its economy and its health producing qualities. It can be used almost constantly for the children, as they are particularly fond of the flavor of molasses and never seem to grow tired of it. We know that our grandmothers realized the healthfulness of foods flavored with molasses as a great number of old fashioned recipes have molasses as one of the principal ingredients. Whenever it is possible, cookies, cake, and any number of puddings should be sweetened with molasses instead of with sugar.

Letters from Far and Near

TO the Home Editor:
I find that it is a great help in saving laundry in the matter of quilts and comforters to put a shield on them. I take a strip of cloth about fifteen inches wide and sew it on like a binding. When it is soiled it can be taken off easily and laundered and put back on again. Flour sacks, which every one has in large numbers, are just the thing and what I nearly always use. I know you will find this a great economy.
Galena, Kansas. Mrs. J. T. SEARS,

To the Home Editor:
This recipe for an eggless cake may help someone. I take one cupful of sugar, one cupful of milk, one teaspoonful of vanilla, one half teaspoonful of salt, two rounding tablespoonfuls of fat, two cupfuls of flour and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Beat well and bake in a moderate oven. The batter must be stiffer than for most cakes, because of the lard and because there are no eggs used. E. M. A.
Putney, Vermont.

To the Home Editor:
Your idea for using picture post cards, mentioned in the Home Page recently, was most welcome and I should like to tell you in return of an idea that I have tried successfully. Get a few sheets of blotting paper of different colors. Paste the best of the used postcards upon this paper. When dry, trim the edges neatly. They make dainty little blotters to slip in with letters or for small gifts all through the year. Easter cards are great favorites with me for this work, but they are just as useful and pretty if made with birthday cards. I always have a supply on hand to enclose with small birthday or Christmas gifts.

Atlanta, Iowa. Mrs. S. G.

To the Home Editor:
I enclose a recipe for chicken loaf which the ladies of my church often use for luncheons. Boil a hen until the flesh drops from the bone. Soak one loaf of bread or an equivalent amount of sliced bread. Remove the bones from the chicken and mix with bread, six eggs (4 will do) and season to taste. Cook in a double boiler one hour and a half. Serve with white sauce.

Some one may appreciate this "discovery." Our granite iron scrub bucket sprang a leak, and not wishing to wait to buy another I tried the experiment of putting a piece of adhesive tape over the hole and was able to use the bucket for two months before it began to leak again.

Bottle bluing sometimes flows too fast from the neck of a bottle. Tie four thicknesses of old muslin or cheesecloth over the neck of the bottle to avoid this.
Keep your fireless cooker free from odor by putting in a piece of charcoal when you place a dish to be cooked in it. Leave the charcoal in when the cooked dish is removed.

If you get a grease spot on your spats rub it with lard, wipe off and wash.
In making dressing for poultry try moistening the breadcrumbs, and then mixing in a spoonful or two of baking powder, according to the amount of bread that is being used. The dressing should not be packed too tightly into the fowl as it becomes sticky.

Muffins, biscuits, and all hot breads, as well as pikerust and puddings, should have a pinch of salt for flavoring or else they will taste flat. Even boiled custard should have a dash of salt when eggs and sugar are beaten together.
Rubbing a piece of raw potato on mud spots in black clothing will remove the spots readily.

A chicken fricassee may be garnished with small yeast or baking powder biscuits cut in halves.
Rice pudding sweetened with brown sugar has a delicious flavor and is much richer than when white sugar is used.

Rosy Cheeks and Raisins

Go Together—Note the Reasons According to Authorities

THERE are other reasons than luscious flavors for the serving of delicious raisin foods. One is the raisin's natural iron content. Raisins, in truth, may be called "a beauty food," for it is iron in the blood that brings the tint of roses to women's and children's pretty cheeks, and is necessary to ruddy health in men. One needs but little iron daily in his food, but that need is vital. Raisins are one of the richest of foods in assimilable iron. Use raisins in plain foods like boiled rice, oatmeal, simple puddings, cakes, cookies, custards, ready-cooked cereals, et cetera. Learn how much better everybody likes these foods with raisins. The luscious fruit-meats are like natural confections. They tempt the appetite. Increase nutrition, too, for raisins furnish 1560 calories of energizing nutriment per pound.

Sift flour, baking powder, and salt into bowl, add shortening and rub in very lightly with tips of fingers, add milk enough to make dough to roll out 1/4 inch thick. Cover with raisins, which have been stewed, thickened and sweetened with one tablespoon sugar, roll the same as jelly roll, place in bake pan which has been brushed with a little butter; sprinkle top with one tablespoon sugar and dot with the balance of butter. Bake in moderate oven 35 to 40 minutes. Serve warm with lemon sauce or milk.

The House That Was Not a Home

Now, I am a willing lender, but I do not consider that a borrowing call makes a good first impression.

While she was there, the girl gave me to understand that any surplus of skim or sour milk which I might have would be acceptable. What a contrast to Mrs. Ware and Benny! And oh, Benny! Benny! How I missed that child! I thought of him day and night, and pined for him. And still, I've been called "a cranky old maid who hates children." Little do people know what they are talking about sometimes. I never was any hand to "make" over children, but I could love a child that loved me; and if Benny could love me, why couldn't another?

For a time I could not endure the thought of having any other child about. Then I began to see how selfish I was. Would I take Benny from his mother? I felt ashamed of the thought; and then an idea came into my brain, and the more I thought about it, the more I resolved to do something.

I wasn't a rich woman by any means, but I had my good home and enough to keep me. And if you have a good thing, why not share it? I finally wrote to a friend of mine who lives in the city and before very long, Maisie was sent to me. Dear little four-year-old Maisie whose parents were dead.

From the minute that she looked at me with her big, solemn eyes that reminded me of Benny's when he had said good-bye—only hers were golden-brown—she was my real little daughter. The good Lord knows that we can't go through life without something to love, and I know that is why He sent Maisie to me. So I adopted her and became reconciled to the loss of Benny.

THE new owners of the "house that was not a home" soon became dissatisfied. "We cannot live there," the girl told me one day. "We are going to move away. The place is for rent."

So they moved. And again the families came and went.

Three years passed before I saw Benny; then one day he came to see me. The sight of him set me a-tremble with happiness. "I thought you had forgotten me," I tried to scold.

"No indeed!" he said. "I've always wanted to come. Mother and I talk about you often."

You don't know how good that made me feel. There is nothing better than knowing you are kindly remembered.

"I couldn't come any sooner," Benny explained, "because when I'm not in school, I'm busy helping mother."

"How do you like your new home?" I asked him.

"Mother says no place has ever seemed so homelike as that." He nodded down the hill.

"Better move back next time it is vacant," I suggested hopefully.

Benny shook his head. "Mother gets more work over there. And I can earn some money to help her, now that I'm getting big." He drew himself up as if to show me how tall he had grown. "I'm to go to school and study hard," he continued, "then when I get to be a man I can buy a home for mother."

Yes, that was what his mother had instilled into his mind—to get an education; then he could have what he willed. And she would give him the education at any sacrifice to herself.

"When I'm a man I'll buy the place down there for mother," he said after a thoughtful pause.

"I hope so, Benny," I said encouragingly, for his words had given me a happy thrill. But—"When I'm a man!" Dear boy! What a long time it seemed to wait!

Benny and Maisie had a good play together. I filled him up on fresh bread and jam and gave him a sack of doughnuts and apples to take home. I also sent more messages to his mother than he could possibly remember. Benny promised to come again; but it was a long time before he kept his promise.

"GOOD morning, Miss Carson." I turned to see who addressed me. It was a tall young man with a handsome face. As his dreamy, blue eyes smiled into mine, something, I couldn't tell what, stirred in my heart just as it used to, long ago.

"I don't believe you know me." He came towards me, still smiling and holding out his hand. "Don't you remember Ben Ware?" he asked.

Mechanically my hand went out to meet his; then I slid right down in a chair that was handy.

"Benny Ware!" was all I could gasp.

I cannot describe my emotions. What I wanted to do was to hug him hard, and cry; but I smothered all that and asked some commonplace question. And of course he never knew how painfully glad I was to see him. I don't say that it's wise to crush back your feelings like that, but it's just my nature to do such things; and I've often been misjudged for it, too.

"I didn't expect you'd know me," Ben said with his pleasant laugh. "It's been twelve years since you saw me and I've changed a lot, I guess," he laughed again. "But you haven't forgotten me, have you?"

Forgotten him! If I could not say the right words to convince him, my grip on his arm must have done so, for he looked as if he understood.

Ben told me a lot about his mother. He didn't seem to be much of a hand to talk about himself, but he told me he had a good position with a big business firm and had been with them for four years. And then all at once he said: "Miss Carson, I'm going to surprise mother on her birthday—a month from tomorrow. I've bought the little place down there where we used to live. I want to get it all fixed up and furnished before she sees it. I've been wondering if you will help me?"

Would I? I was ready to begin right that minute. We talked for an hour and at the end of that time it was hard to tell which was the more enthused with our plans—Ben or myself.

IN a few days a force of workmen were hammering at the house that was not a home, and when they were through, I tell you it was neat. The plum trees, full of half-grown fruit, were all that remained unchanged about the place.

Once more I waited there until the moving van came. But this time it was loaded with nice new furniture and rugs. There was no sad little woman on a box seat, either; for hadn't Ben and I planned the grand surprise? Of course Mrs. Ware knew that Ben had been saving to buy a home, so we made it up that on her birthday, he should take her out to look at some properties and bring her there.

It's of no use for me to try to tell you how pleased that mother was when she came. No words of mine could describe her joy. She had aged some in the fifteen years since I had seen her, but she was not an old woman by any means. I knew she had had a hard struggle to bring up her boy and educate him as she had done, but now how was she repaid! I tell you that mother was justly proud of her boy.

It is so good to have them for neighbors again. Ben goes every morning to his business in the city and comes back at night. The trolley runs out here now, so it is no trouble for him to come and go.

Yes, Ben comes here—quite frequently of late, too, I notice—and I'm beginning to have a suspicion that it's not to see me that he comes so often, either though he does profess to be awfully fond of me.

It just struck me last night—the way things were going to turn out. I'm judging by the way Ben looks at Maisie and the way she blushes, and—well I'm pretty sure that the little house down there will always be a home, and a happy one, too.

The Vital Reason for the Internal Bath

In Chicago recently, there was held a gigantic political meeting that attracted a crowd of some 15,000 men and women of varying ages. On the outskirts of the assembly stood a physician with a friend. Turning to his friend, the medical man said, "I'll wager that in this vast throng there aren't 100 persons who are in anything like normal health."

Much as we dislike unpleasant truths, there is significance in that physician's remark, for all of us. Few of us can honestly say that we are over 50 per cent. efficient.

We all want to be free from disease or ailment of any kind. We all want to have pure blood, normal heart and sound nerves. We all want to enjoy restful nights and active, vigorous days. Yet most of us are half the time blue and worried, all the time nervous, and most of the time actually incapacitated by illness.

And why? Largely because we do not follow a few simple rules in the care of our physical condition. How many of us, for instance, practice internal bathing? True it is that this means of improving the physical condition is growing in use every day, but there are thousands of us yet who are strangers to the benefits of the Internal Bath.

The need for internal bathing is due simply to the fact that we have within our bodies such an organ as the large intestine, commonly called the colon. Accumulating waste as it does, the colon is the bane of our health. The waste is toxic, which means poisonous, and as the blood flows through the walls of the colon, it absorbs the poisons and carries them through the circulation. That's what causes Auto-Intoxication—which in plain English means "Self-Poisoning," a condition which pulls down our powers of resistance and renders us subject to almost any serious ailment that may be prevalent at the time. And the worst feature of it is that few of us know when we are "Auto-Intoxicated."

The proper kind of Internal Bath is Nature's own relief and corrector—just warm water, which, used in the correct way, cleanses the colon thoroughly its entire length and makes and keeps it sweet and pure.

The effect on your physical condition is little short of marvelous. Your eyes take on a new sparkle, your step a new vigor. Your nerves relax, your appetite improves, and your sleep becomes more restful, more refreshing. You feel re-made.

To really understand the Internal Bath and all that it accomplishes, one should read the very interesting booklet by Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, the inventor of the "J. B. L. Cascade." Dr. Tyrrell's own life was saved and prolonged by Internal Bathing and he wrote on the subject like the eminent authority that he was. The booklet, which is entitled "The What, the Why, and the Way of Internal Bathing," will interest every man and woman. All that is necessary to secure this booklet is to write to Tyrrell's Hygienic Institute, No. 134 West 65th St., New York City, and mention having read this article in Christian Herald. The booklet will be mailed to you free of all cost or obligation.

There is nothing so important as the kind of health which keeps us fit, confident and enthusiastic for the day's work; and as the getting of this Book involves no expense, why not write for it now, while it is fresh in your mind?—(Advertisement) itself. Along this drive for much of the way the surf dashes against fine stone battlements, and on the other side are narrow parks, making the whole fifteen miles of the drive one long highway of loveliness."

THE blue Danube is the glory of Budapest, as its mountain-girt harbor is the glory of Rio de Janeiro. Even today when half-starved children and adults crowd the streets of the capital of Hungary, when its industries are paralyzed, and its ancient government destroyed by war and revolution, the great river rolls on as majestically as ever, between Pest on the left bank and Buda on the right, and laves the piers of a series of the most beautiful bridges I have ever seen.

The bridges have the advantage of connecting palatial buildings of unusual loveliness on either bank. On the Buda side of the river is the royal palace of the Hapsburgs, which they seldom graced (or cursed) with their presence, preferring Vienna to Budapest for their residence. This palace is the most imposing in Europe. It stands on a gentle hill, and with its ample and most artistic proportions it dignifies all the landscape.

On the Pest side of the river are the Houses of Parliament, which rival our own Capitol and the splendid British Parliament buildings on the Thames for size and beauty. Besides, in Pest, are splendid business blocks, hotels and public buildings of all kinds, which help me to give the second award to the city on the Danube.

Geneva has so many claims to a place among the cities beautiful, and so many have seen these beauties with their own eyes, that I need not dwell upon them. At the end of placid Lake Leman it lies, and for miles one can trace the shining waters of the lake lying cozily between the mighty Alps, which brood over her on every side. Especially the northern end of the lake, which, to be sure, one cannot see from Geneva, is a mountain-encircled gem.

On clear days Mont Blanc itself lies like a white cloud on Geneva's horizon, and on days, foul or fair, the lake, the rushing green waters of the Rhone flowing through the heart of the city, Rousseau's island, a tiny park in the lake, and the promenades along the shore, add unfailing interest to the city.

Historic memories always throng in Geneva, memories embodied in stone, in Calvin's church (St. Peter's Protestant Cathedral), in the monument to Servetus, and many other historic events in which Geneva has played a part so striking.

And now the palace of the League of Nations on the water-front houses within its generous halls the chief hope of a war-weary world.

WHY do I put Stockholm, the capital of Sweden among the "big four" in my estimation? Many would dispute its claim very likely, but if they will live there for a few weeks I think the spell of this northern metropolis will grip them.

Here, too, a rushing river holds a supreme place among the attractions, tearing like mad as it does through the city, from great Lake Malar to lose itself in the Baltic. A hundred excursions on either side of the city afford one most charming glimpses of islet and forest and village and castle.

Going west one sees a continuous panorama of exquisite scenery, for many, many miles, through lake and river, until one reaches the prosperous port of Gothenburg on the Atlantic. The King's enormous palace in Stockholm is striking rather than beautiful, to an eye untutored in palaces, but other buildings for legislation, business and education are well worthy of this northern metropolis.

Here my pen must stop, in spite of my desire to add city after city to the list of "most beautifuls." How fortunate it is that to the home-lover his own city, whether large or small, is the "most beautiful." So is my home city in my eyes, and so, I hope, it is with you.

Questions and Answers

E. B., Wilmington, Del. Many an earnest and sincere Christian has "dark days" in which faith is beclouded and the way often seems difficult and misleading. At such times we find cheer and gather renewed courage in the visit of some friend who has traveled farther along the road of spiritual experience than ourselves, and whose Christianity is of the kind that sets life aglow again. Such an one inspires renewed faith in the great truth that "all things work together for those that love God." As a spiritual tonic to fortify us against "blue days" and their depressing influence, a good book dealing with personal experiences in soul growth, is one of the best remedies we know of. Such a book is "What and Where is God?" by Rev. Richard La Rue Swain, which is really the biography of a soul in travail. But the best of all remedies for brightening dull days is Christian companionship, where two can pray and work together. You no doubt remember how the companionship of Faithful, in "Pilgrim's Progress," his songs and his heartening talk, kept Christian in good spirits, and greatly helped him. The happiest type is the man or woman who never forgets that he or she holds a commission in "the King's business," and who is always doing something to help somebody else, remembering Him who said: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

Reader, Danbury, Conn. (and others). There are several passages from which an inference may be drawn as to conscious existence after death, in the absence of an explicit statement in the Bible. The first of these is Christ's assurance to the penitent thief (Luke 23:43): "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." It was evidently a place of conscious existence. A second passage is contained in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31). Some allowance must be made for the form of picture-teaching Christ used, but here he certainly described a conscious existence for the soul prior to the resurrection. The third passage is Paul's expression of a desire for death (Phil. 1:23). He wishes "to depart and to be with Christ." He clearly expected that as soon as he died he would realize this hope. Besides, see the very clear state in Rev. 14:13. "They rest from their labors," does not imply total cessation, but rather a temporary sojourn in a realm of repose and recuperation. These are a few of the statements from which some authorities have drawn the inference of a conscious state immediately after death. It is not clear that Paul expected a resurrection of the identical body. He expected to receive a spiritualized body. (I. Cor. 15:37).

W. C. McG., Harrison, O., writes apropos of a recent article in the Christian Herald: "As to the causes of crime, I am in perfect agreement with the Herald. As to the second given reason, I have thought much about it. 'Train the children to be good citizens.' In the olden times (Deut. 11:18-21) these good things were always made very prominent in the home, and the fathers were to train themselves to keep the track! Now, instead of so much general preaching, would it not be better if there were more special applications at close range—the preachers showing the parents, and the parents showing the children their duty and privilege?"

The need of more care and attention in the spiritual shepherding of the children is now being widely emphasized, and seems likely to produce good results. Our churches and Sunday schools should be made, more than ever in the past, Gospel sheepfolds, where the little ones can be trained for the Kingdom. But above all other influences to that end we must place the influence of the Christian home. The Family Altar is well-nigh forsaken and must be restored. The best training a child can receive and that which makes the most lasting impression, is the training given by a godly father and mother, the memory of whose example, teaching and prayers is rarely if ever effaced. Besides, we should not forget that Jesus Himself said, with special reference to childhood: "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

Miss E. B. R., Utica, N. Y. As substitutes for the Christian religion, the cults you mention are a gross delusion. The best thing is to let them alone and cling to the religion of the Bible. There is no substitute for the Gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ.

J. F., Windfall, Ind. There is a great lack of housing accommodations in New York City. The result is over-crowding, which is not confined to the poorer class of tenements. The children are by no means neglected, however, and at one period of the congestion, many families were sheltered temporarily by arrangement of the city authorities. Builders are hurrying forward many new houses to completion and more are planned. Altogether the situation is one that can only be relieved by extensive building in the suburbs.

D. B., Hackensack, N. J., writes "On reading so much in the newspapers relative to the serious condition of the housing question, and the high cost of rents, it struck me that the present would be a good time to illustrate the practical value of co-operation. We have an illustration of this in the co-operative apartment, and saving through the plan a considerable percentage on rental and ordinary expenses. It has always been a mystery to me why our co-operative stores have not been more successful. The women seem to prefer to go around shopping for home supplies, and having a good time, although they know quite well that they are paying considerably higher prices for their purchases. The H. O. of L. should give a good boost to co-operation. Like many others, I would like to see it have a thorough trial. It is no small item to save from 12 to 20 per cent. of food and fuel bills, if one figures it out on the expenditures of a whole year."

Our Hackensack reader strikes a note which others have struck before, but he speaks the truth. Co-operation in home ownership and family supplies has not yet had a fair trial, save in a very few localities.

Rev. J. Haber, Route 1, Baldwin, Kans., would like to hear from persons experienced in the use of lantern slides to illustrate Bible stories, "as a possible means to help win young folks in a rural church that has been losing its grip upon its young folks for years."

Major F. M. Culver, Salina, Kans., writes apropos of the great charity movements of our days: "There were many widows in Israel in the days of Elijah, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when there came a great famine over all the land; and unto none was Elijah sent, save unto Sarepta, unto a woman that was a widow." (Luke 4:25, 26). From the above statement of the Master, I take it for granted that all widows are not to be considered public burdens, but that the true widow is the one who has no outside income, no relation to help her, and no children to look to, who are able to supply her bodily needs. While this text refers to the 'widow,' it can be justly applied to all cases of charity. I am a firm believer in charity, but do not approve of lax systems of giving. I encourage the helping hand, but am down on anything that stimulates shiftlessness and encourages crime. I do not believe in any system that produces 'leaners.' We need 'pushers'—men and women who can stand on their own props. Crime in all its worst stages travels the path of idleness. The familiar statement that 'an idle brain is the devil's workshop' is only too true, and the same statement holds good for idle muscles."

Mrs. L. D. P. Referring to your letter on John 2:16, there was nothing wrong in the merchandise, but it was a high-handed profanation to bring any such traffic into the sacred place—the Temple. To Jesus, the Temple, as the seat of His Father's worship, was the symbol of that holy reverence which is due to Him from all on earth. We should love the Lord's house and protect it from invasion by the world, and from being made a place of sale and barter. Jesus' cleansing of the Temple (which, according to some commentators occurred on three different occasions), set up a standard of sanctity and simplicity which it would be well for all churches to keep in view.

The huge guns of a modern fighting-ship—man's creation for man's destruction. Beside them the cannon of a decade ago are tiny. What will another decade bring forth if the armament race continues?

Disarmament and World Reconstruction

SUPPOSE a business concern acting on the principle that it was menaced by burglars, or enemies wanting to destroy it, should use ninety-three cents out of every dollar paid in by the stockholders for police protection, for uniforms, guns, clubs and whistles, and have left only seven cents out of every dollar for the operation of the plant. Suppose that you were a stockholder, what would you think and do about it?

This is exactly what is now happening in the United States. We are all stockholders in the government, and its business is operated on the taxes we pay. Of every dollar that is paid by the tax-payers of the United States, ninety-three cents goes to pay for war and war purposes and only seven cents is left to pay for all the other functions of the government. Is there not something wrong when only seven cents is available for normal and legitimate purposes? Compare this with the cost of police protection in the past and as an insurance against possible depredations in the future! Is it any wonder that education and moral reform halt when the government provides less than one cent out of every dollar for these purposes?

The cost of maintaining armaments is the most crushing burden that civilized nations have to carry. A modern battleship of the first class costs about forty million dollars. After the plans are adopted, and before it is finished, it has become almost obsolete, and new and mightier ships are ordered. Our naval estimates for 1921 are approximately seven hundred million dollars. Compare this with Germany's naval program for 1914, which was $113,993,329. Great Britain's in the same year was $260,714,275.

The appropriation asked for the army for the current year amounts to $678,791,233. Germany's appropriation for her army in 1913, the year before the war, amounted to $162,958,814. In other words we are asking for our army four times as much as Germany expended on her army the year previous to the war. We may well ponder the inference made by General Bliss when he said that any nation failing to respond to the conference for disarmament is a New Germany and should have the distinguished and particular scrutiny of the United States. General Pershing is responsible for the statement that the cost for maintaining our army and navy for the next year will be the enormous sum of five million dollars for every working day in the year!

Now Is the Time to Lift the Crushing Burden Imposed by Fear of War

By HENRY A. ATKINSON

General Secretary of the Church Peace Union

This bill is paid by the people of the United States through taxation. This burden is increased beyond all reason by the expenditures for past and future wars. The estimate for the navy alone for 1921 exceeds the total cost of government for the first year of the Wilson Administration, not counting the Post Office Department which is to all intents and purposes self-sustaining. The population of the United States has increased 200 per cent. within a century, and the per capita cost of government has increased 600 per cent. One of the chief statisticians of the United States Bureau of Standards is authority for the statement that in peace times the cost of the military and naval upkeep of the United States was $4.70 for every man, woman and child in the nation. But now under the new plan the cost will be approximately $130 a year for every person. This includes the amount paid in direct taxes and the amount paid indirectly by reason of the increased cost of living.

THE god of war has held his undisputed sway over the world for the last six years. Millions of men lie dead. Other millions are crippled. The world is crushed by the load of its debts, and it is not at all certain at this time that civilization will live. And why all this ruin? Germany is the popular answer. We will not soon forget the arrogance of the militarists in this nation and their careless disregard of every moral consideration. Germany wanted war. She was ready for war and she plunged the world into war. But the other nations must share with her the common guilt.

Through the long years of peace preceding 1914 all the nations of Europe were preparing for war and they got war. Germany thought she saw a menace in Russia; France saw a menace in Germany; Italy thought she was menaced by Austria; England feared the commercial rivalry and economic success of the Continental countries. Each one of these powers held in subject peoples and nations under their colonial system. Huge armies were formed. Millions of men were trained in all the different nations. Battleships were built by the hundreds. Time, money and all the ingenuity of science were utilized in the construction of greater engines of war and more deadly explosives. Finally the pyramid of armaments thus built up became so heavy that it tumbled into ruin and carried down with it in a common destruction all the hopes and aspirations of the world of culture, literature and art. Armaments were the greatest single cause for the world war. The story of the wreck of Europe is written in blood and flame in every nation of the world. Any one can read this record.

Why then this talk of greater navies and huge armies and more deadly lethal engines? Why this new competition in the art and machinery of making war? Men do not learn easily and apparently out of the war we have not learned its one great lesson, and that is that the nation that lives by the sword dies by the sword. All the nations are evincing an absurd fear and the shadow of war is still blotting out the sun from the pathway that all the nations must tread. The world is full of panic and suspicion of others' motives and questionings of national integrity are found everywhere.

Only a few of the nations are in a position to begin the preparation for more war. America, Japan and some of the South American nations are the only ones that have come out of this period with any financial strength, and yet all the nations, even those who have suffered the most, are talking and planning war because of this inherent fear.

THERE is no sound reason why the United States should attempt to have the biggest navy in the world. All the arguments for such an ambition resolves itself into simply this—that the United States is determined to have a greater navy than Great Britain. We do not need such a navy to protect us from Great Britain. England is not in a position to wage war against any nation, much less the United States, nor is there any considerable sentiment within the Empire that would back up and make effective a war with America. Everybody in England as well as in America, who thinks at all, knows that war between these two great English-speaking nations would mean the total destruction of both nations and the complete collapse of civilization.

We have had for over a hundred years the border between the United States and Canada, this great British possession to our north, unprotected by a single soldier or a single gun. Should Canada and the United States forego their century-old plan of maintaining peace and cordial relations and substitute for it forts and guns along the border and armed vessels upon the Great Lakes it would not be one generation before the two nations would be at war.

America armed becomes a menace to the world. One of the most humiliating experiences in all our history was that which occurred recently at Geneva when the representatives of the nations began to talk seriously of disarmament, and then one and all dropped the subject and backed out of the discussion because the shadow of huge armaments, growing in America, made them afraid. I have a letter received a few days ago from a man across the sea that has in it these words:

"We are all puzzled because of America's huge war plans. What does it mean? Against whom are you arming? Having helped to save the world for democracy, are you now going to plunge into a mad race for naval and military power which is the negation of democracy and which marks out the road that has brought all of our European nations to the verge of bankruptcy, robbed us of our best men and filled all Europe with despair?"

How can we answer such a question? A militarist in America armed to the teeth is just as dangerous as a militarist in any other nation. If we are arming against aggression from without, it is then an open question as to whether or not the type of armament is adequate for our needs. The experts, so called, are quarreling now over just such a question. Germany with a much smaller navy than Great Britain successfully repelled every attack on her own territory, and did not allow troops to land in any one of her harbors. It is impossible for us to create a navy large enough to protect us. Maine with its hundreds of miles of coast-line is just the beginning of that long line down to Florida, that would require a naval equipment of such magnitude as to bankrupt us, and even then it would not be sufficient. In addition there is the whole Pacific Coast as well as the ports on the Gulf of Mexico to be protected!

The jingo politician backed up by the jingo newspaper, and both supported by interests that make their living as profiteers out of war, have created the bogie of enemies who are ever hovering on the border of our nation to destroy our country and enslave our people. It is to their interest to keep this fear always before the mind of the people. Let the people of our nation once realize the sources from which these false fears come, and it can be said of the profiteers in war and the things that make war, as it was said of the kings of an older time, "War is a game that were their subjects wise, kings would not play at."

THERE is every reason for limiting armaments and no reason for maintaining them. Whom do we fear anyway?

Dr. Jefferson shows the folly of saying that we must maintain peace by preparing for war in this bit of delicious sarcasm:

"We do not want war," says the advocate of big armies and navies, "and therefore we have no fear of militarism in this country." Nations as well as individuals get not what they desire, but what they deserve. No man wants delirium tremens. He simply wants to drink. He says, "Give me another glass. I do not want delirium tremens. Fill up the glass again. I do not want delirium tremens. Fill up the glass once more. I do not want delirium tremens. Let me drink all night and then all day, but I do not want delirium tremens." He gets at last not what he wants, but what he deserves. And when a man says, "I do not want war, but cover the land with soldiers; I do not want war, but cover the sea with battleships; I do not want war, but fill the air with bomb-dropping aeroplanes," and when this is done, war comes no matter what the nation wants."

There has now been a most remarkable turn of the world's opinion toward disarmament. Even while the nations were talking their war talk, suddenly there began to be heard voices from all the world crying together for such a blessing as disarmament. Great Britain through her most responsible leaders has pronounced in its favor. Lloyd George says, "We can do it all together." The Bishop of Durham, "Competition in naval armaments will be criminal folly." Father Vaughn, most famous Jesuit priest in England, "No world peace is possible without disarmament." General Sir Frederick Maurice, expert writer on military affairs, "Armaments are ineffective as insurance against war." Lord Northcliffe, the most influential newspaper owner in Great Britain, "With the object of the campaign for disarmament, every man and woman who seeks peace and good-will among civilized nations must heartily sympathize." Lord Grey, "When any one nation has begun to force the pace in this competition for arms, let the Council of Nations prevent that competition from growing up once more."

Lord Coudray, British Oil King, "The chief rivalry between great nations today should be a rivalry in disarmament." Lieut.-Commander Kenworthy of the British Navy, "The best that could possibly happen to the world is this: At a certain hour on a certain day and certain month to be arranged, every ship of

Waiting to be "Beaten into Ploughshares." Austria surrendered these cannon to Italy under the peace terms to be melted down for use in reconstruction work—an appropriate close to their careers war belonging to every nation should be taken into deep water and sunk with appropriate ceremony, officers of the navies of all nations being liberally pensioned, their pensions depending upon their not agitating for more warships." These men represent the real center of thought and life in Great Britain.

The leaders in France are no less outspoken. Andre Tardieu says, "I am whole-heartedly in favor of any movement toward general disarmament." Viviani, the ex-Premier of France, says, "When Germany shall have completely disarmed under the terms of the treaty, we shall ask nothing better, peace being firmly established, than to attain a state better for humanity." General Nivelle, the hero of Verdun, "General disarmament is greatly to be desired." Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, Chairman of the Air Commission of the French Senate, "If Governments, after the lesson of the war do not agree simultaneously to limit their armaments, they commit suicide."

Nitti, formerly Premier of Italy, "Each nation has

One form of disarmament. Rendering useless the great weapons which defended the Kiel Canal

its imperialism, great nations and little ones, especially little ones. Competition in imperialism has become senseless. The whole of civilization is threatened. Each nation arms because the others arm, and Europe is maintaining with violence a division between the victors and the vanquished which now threatens the future of the victors more than the future of the vanquished."

In Japan we find the same sentiment. Baron Hayashi, the Japanese ambassador to Great Britain, "It is foolish and it is tragic to think of the big states of Great Britain, United States and Japan competing in a race for armaments." Viscount Ishii, and Viscount Uchida, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and other leading statesmen have put themselves on record as favoring disarmament.

In America we find the same thing. Mr. Taft says, "Of course I favor, in the interest of world peace and national economy, reduction and limitation of armament by the leading maritime powers." General Bliss, General Pershing, business men like William Fellowes Morgan, Henry L. Stoddard, Bernard M. Baruch and hundreds of others have pronounced against the folly of nations arming one against the other.

PERHAPS some one reading this article says, "These opinions are merely those of idealists; practical statesmen take a different view." The answer to such a criticism is not far to seek. It was the practical statesmen who plunged the world into horror and war. The world is indebted to an idealist for such peace as we have. The writer will resent the implication that he does not pay sufficient heed to the facts as they are today. He thinks he knows something about the world and about the forces of evil that are abroad among the nations. He is not contented at all to leave our nation unprotected. Force is not wrong in and of itself. It is the use that is made of force that determines its moral quality.

We will always need a police force. We will need some ships and a small army. All that is contended for in this article is that the policing of our nation shall be put in its proper relationship to other functions of government. We must have policemen in Chicago and in New York and our other cities, but these cities do not exist simply for the purpose of supporting a police force, the makers of police uniforms, guns, police whistles and police clubs. A policeman is a very incidental part of the life of the community taken as a whole. By all means let us recognize that each nation must have adequate police protection, and until the League of Nations becomes more effective and there has been created an international police force, both on land and sea, each nation will have to guard its own interests, but the army and navy should be cut to the smallest possible point commensurate with safety; and the direction of this important function must be taken out of the hands of that "band of adventurers, traitors, owners and forestallers who betrayed mankind into the morass of hate and bloodshed of the recent war."

Suppose that we had the money that we are now putting into ships and men and guns and forts to protect us against outside enemies and could use it for constructive purposes. In the first place we could have better schools, better public health service, more money for the carrying out of measures passed by the legislators in behalf of the common good. This would develop a finer and better basis for public opinion in America.

We have our problem with Mexico. Suppose instead of putting such huge sums of money into men and guns, we had the price of a single capital ship that we could put into education in our sister republic to the south. With forty million dollars we could found and endow sixteen Tuskegee Institutes. Suppose the United States Government deliberately planned in co-operation with the Mexican Government to establish these sixteen industrial and agricultural institutes of the same kind and grade as Tuskegee at sixteen strategic centers in Mexico. In one generation the most outstanding difficulties experienced by the Mexican people and government would be overcome, and all the principal problems which now involve the peace and friendly relations of these two nations would be solved. For the price of one battleship we could achieve in thirty years what cannot be brought about by the greatest army and the most powerful navy in the world in a century.

This is just one illustration. A dozen similar fields of service present themselves to the mind. In the realm of agriculture there are the deserts of the west to be redeemed. Then there is the wide field of social betterment, of industrial experimentation, of mechanical invention, the beautifying of our cities and the increasing of those things which really make for the enrichment of human life.

ONE nation alone cannot disarm, nor make very much progress toward reduction of armaments. There must be an agreement among the nations. But there must be a start somewhere. We can prove our unselfishness by setting the example to the other nations and cut our appropriations for armaments in half and then join with the other nations in working out a plan whereby this crushing burden will be lifted from the shoulders of mankind.

The question then is up for settlement. We must decide now what the policy of the world will be, and upon our decision depends the peace, prosperity and happiness of millions of men yet unborn. If we can bring about an agreement by which all the nations will limit their armaments now, it will be comparatively easy to secure a greater curtailment from year to year, until finally the world is changed from a series of armed camps into an orderly world community. If we fail to limit armaments now it takes no prophet to foresee that there will be a greater and more destructive war just as soon as a new generation of fighting men have been raised up and trained for their deadly business.

The Golden Rule in Business

Its Application Brings Wonderful Prosperity to One Firm

By WORTH M. TIPPY

THE Babson Labor Conference for 1920 devoted an afternoon and morning to the discussion of Religion in Business. A striking paper on "The Golden Rule in Business" was read by Mr. Arthur Nash of Cincinnati, president of the A. Nash Company, Inc., explaining the working out of the principle in that factory. This paper aroused great interest among the business men, labor managers and industrial engineers present, and was influential in determining the report of the Findings Committee.

The story of the beginnings of the A. Nash Company experiment is interesting reading. In 1918 Mr. Nash bought out a men's garment factory in Cincinnati. When the transfer had been completed and the first pay-roll was laid on his desk Mr. Nash discovered that seven dollars a week was an average wage in the factory and that some old women were working for as low as three dollars a week. After reflection he concluded that as a Christian man he could not allow the factory to proceed on such a wage basis, and yet to increase wages sufficiently seemed to invite failure.

Taking a quick inventory of material on hand, Mr. Nash figured that he could increase the lowest paid women from three to twelve dollars a week, and others to what seemed to him a fair wage, and yet be able to liquidate the company, when stocks on hand should be made up, with $28,000 net capital from the investment. "We will then buy a farm and go out of business with what is left," he said to his son; "for we cannot succeed on such a wage basis, and we will not attempt to succeed on any other."

Calling the employees together, he announced the wage increases, and said: "We will run this factory as long as we run it on the basis of the Golden Rule. This means that in my relations with you I will try to put myself in your place. I will ask myself the question, If I were in your place and you were in mine, what would I want you to do? I ask you to let the same rule govern your actions toward me."

THEN came the unexpected. Instead of running behind, the factory began to make money from the start. "I learned," said Mr. Nash, "that not only is the Golden Rule God's law for business, but that the saying of Jesus of Nazareth, 'Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you,' is also to be relied upon with equal assurance."

The experience of the A. Nash Company is the more significant because the year 1919, the initial year of the experiment, was a year of unprecedented upheavals in the clothing and textile industries. In that year and early 1920 there were strikes, small production and unheard-of prices; in June, July and August of 1920 there was little business, cancellation of orders, factories closed down and unheard-of price-cutting among merchants.

During a year of strikes, the A. Nash Company had no strikes. During a year of low production the company increased its production 1000 per cent! During a year of high prices the company manufactured suits and overcoats to retail at from $16.50 to $29.00. When stagnation hit the clothing industry, the A. Nash Company did $81,000 more business in the first six months of 1920 than in all of 1919. In June, 1920, its business was equal to the year of 1918. July and August are dull months in the wholesale tailoring business. During July, 1920, the business was but $12,000 behind the biggest previous month, in spite of the fact that all employees were given a week's vacation on pay. In that month 4,036 orders were filled; in October 1920, 8,853.

The space occupied by the company in the Power Building became too small, and in July, 1919, the factory was moved into an abandoned whiskey and distilling building on East Eighth Street. This gave seven times the floor space previously in use. Mr. Nash called the operatives together, explained the conditions of hate and strife in the industry, and asked them to secure and train new workers from among their friends. The working force was increased 600 per cent. without an advertisement for labor, and the selection and training of new workers were remarkably successful. The plant is now filled to capacity, and it has been necessary since September 1, 1920, to establish three departments in outside buildings.

THE company had planned a scheme of profit-sharing, but when it was talked over with the workers, they asked instead to be paid each week, and left it to the management to figure out what wages should be. Several increases were made during 1919 as production mounted. When the inventory was taken at the end of 1919, it was found that in spite of wage increases and the expense of moving and setting up the new plant there was still a net profit of $42,000 on a capital of $80,000. The company was paying higher wages, selling its product for less money and making larger profits than any of its competitors.

This was explained to the workers' open conference and an immediate increase in wages was put into effect.

The practical working of the Golden Rule in the factory is illustrated by the following incidents. At the end of February, 1920, it was found that costs of manufacturing had been less than was anticipated when the wage increase of January 1 had been put into effect.

"We immediately called our help together again," said Mr. Nash. "This time we told them that when we had presented the profit-sharing proposition there was only a little handful of them, and it was possible for us to figure approximately what each one was producing each week, but that since our working force had increased to over four hundred, and we were producing a little better than a suit of clothes every two minutes, it was not possible for us to tell with any degree of accuracy what each one was producing per week. We again laid before them the profit-sharing basis of arriving at a just wage, and told them that we knew of no other way to solve the problem. This time they voted unanimously to adopt this system."

"By the plan presented to them the profits were to be divided among the help on the basis of salaries earned twice each year. I did not know, nor had I thought, of any other basis of division, and I think probably no other basis had occurred to the employees when they accepted this one. But when they got back out into the workrooms, the Golden Rule began to work in their minds. Imagine my feeling when a few days later the following petition, signed by seventeen employees, was laid on my desk:

"Realizing that the A. Nash Company is using every effort to be truly just and democratic, and realizing that in making the final adjustment of wages on the profit-sharing basis a very large share of this final payment, as at present intended, would go to those making big wages, and heartily agreeing with the management that it is not just that the lion's share of the profits should go to any individual, or small group of individuals, we, the undersigned, all of whom are drawing a weekly wage of over sixty dollars ($60), do hereby petition the management of the A. Nash Company to distribute the workers' share of profits, which is to be distributed July 1, 1920, on the basis of time worked instead of on the basis of wages drawn."

"This will give those making the smaller wage an equal dividend with those making the larger one, and we believe is not only needed by them, but is just and in keeping with the policy of our Company. We are sure this will be appreciated by all the help."

LET me impress on your minds just what that petition meant in our factory. The skilled labor, like the cutters and the off-pressers who were making from $75 to $90 a week, signed a petition that the poorest paid help should receive the same dividend that they did. In our place we have some old ladies who are past the age of learning to run machines, or doing skilled operations, whom we keep so as to help them feel that they have a degree of independence in life. Besides these there are the beginners who on account of their lack of experience are not drawing large wages. If the dividend had been made as originally intended the high-paid help would have gotten six or seven times as much as these old ladies and the new help who really needed it. When the dividend was made in accordance with this petition every one who put in the full six months received $91.80 as his share of the dividend, or a little over $3.50 for each week's work.

"Now let us study for a moment the question of the increasing volume of business during this period of stagnation and price-cutting. When we decided to make the Golden Rule our governing law it was impressed upon every mind that doing to others as we would be done by did not simply mean employer and employee, but meant each customer on our books as well. It meant that every garment we sold must be of a standard that we would be willing to accept, and sold at a price that we would be willing to pay if we were in the customer's place. It meant that our help saw behind each order a fellow human being whom they wanted to deal with as they would want to be dealt with. It was an honest effort at applying the Golden Rule that fixed our prices during the 1919 orgy of high prices and profiteering."

The long-suffering public was conscious of these facts, and while others were losing the confidence of the public we were gaining their confidence, so that when the time came that the public went on a non-buying strike we were no more affected by that strike than we were when the laborers went on a strike."

I ASKED Mr. Nash if the company was working out a system for the management of the factory based upon the Golden Rule, so that the method he has developed may become permanent. He replied: "The thing that I have endeavored to emphasize is not a system, but a principle; and wherever that principle is functioning, any system will work, and wherever that principle is not active, any system will have its difficulties."

But Mr. Nash went on to say in further answer to the question, that the company is working out a system of co-operative stock ownership as well as participation in control. As serfdom passed into the wage system, so the wage system, he thinks, will pass into co-operative industry. What he understands by this is indicated by what he is doing and what he is planning to do. Heads of departments are being trained to be capable of going ahead with their departments. All serious moves by the management are taken up with the body of employees, or by departments. The method followed is illustrated by the previously mentioned selection and training of new workers. Another illustration is from the cutting department. Here the cutters themselves worked out a plan by which, through the use of large tables on which garments could be cut and stacked, and by a preliminary classification of orders for suits and overcoats, they were able to increase greatly their output over the old method of small tables and cutting of garments in the order in which they were received. These same cutters, it may be said in passing, increased their output the first year from six to thirty suits a day.

This brings one to the heart of the A. Nash Company experiment. The business organization of the company is not essentially different from other factories of its size and type. That which is distinctive is that it is an illustration of co-operative organization based upon good-will and just dealing between banker, employer, employee and the consuming public.

The co-operative principle in industry may express itself in some form of socialism, as for example Communism, or the guild system, such as the Plumb Plan for the management of railroads or mines. Or it may take the form of co-operatives for manufacturing or merchandizing. Or it may express itself in co-operative relations between employers and workers within the present organization of industry.

The Nash plan is in the realm of the last of the three, and therein lies its importance. If the co-operative principle can be worked out successfully within the present economic order, it will conserve the enormous advantages of private industry—its freedom of initiative, inventiveness, intensive supervision over smaller industrial units, and strong personal incentive to effort—together with the power which lies in the co-operative principle. We need never face the bureaucracy, the inevitable national straight-jacket, and the initial terrorism of revolutionary socialism. In the experience of the A. Nash Company the principle followed has greatly increased production, done away with labor conflicts, brought out the capacity of the workers and awakened the best instincts in all concerned. It has acted in short as a true spiritual force.

The Springs

A Story of Rejuvenation

By NANCY FOUTS GLATFELTER

Illustrated by M. L. Greer

Growing old was no dreadful thing if one had the sense to find a congenial occupation.
Mothering was hers

while she flipped the pages of the last fashion magazine: "We're not going to let you have a single dull minute from now on, Ev. We never do, and first—the club starts Friday and you and Howard are positively to be in it. He's promised."

"I'd love to," Evelyn confessed, "and of course Howard will go if I urge him—"

"Well, see that you urge, then," commanded her sister-in-law.

"And this afternoon," insinuated Miss Bunny, "you must go to the beauty parlor with us and let Madgie take you in hand."

"No," refused Evelyn, flatly, "I hate that sort of thing. Not for other people—" she apologized hastily, "—but for me."

"But you'd look years younger—" Miss Bunny's offended tone gave edge to the implication.

"Do I look old, Myrtle?" demanded Evelyn, as of an impartial judge.

"Why, not exactly, dear; of course not. Bun didn't mean that—it's just that such things will help put in the time—" amuse you."

"Oh," cried Evelyn contritely, "you're both being good to me and I must seem ungrateful. I will need amusement, of course—but I do feel so—well just flat!"

The club reception stood out in Evelyn's memory as a very tragedy. She had dressed for it in an absolutely zestless mood. There were the gray hairs over her ears to be covered with the still untouched brown from above. A woman who had gray hair—she told herself angrily—was past getting ready for such affairs.

It was no lack of attention that left her unsatisfied and miserable. Nor was it clothes, for none of the other women were gowned more effectively than herself. The music was lively and the refreshments excellent. But Evelyn moved in the midst of it a thing apart. This couldn't be real. This was for young folks—and she was forty-four.

Before she said her prayers that night, Evelyn opened her mother's scrapbook at a thumbworn page, and read through blinding tears:

"Oh, years that held our earlier prime—
Youth—when we laughed and sighed,
There is no gate to let us back
When once we stand outside."

"I'm getting most too old for these jamborees," Howard groaned, kicking off a torturing shoe.

"I never want to go again, anyway," Evelyn sighed, and even laughed a little at his eager "That suits me."

PATIENTLY, sometimes desperately, Evelyn tried successively bridge, civics, golf, politics, china-painting, and a terrible culture club, but October found her with nerves so jumpy and mind so melancholy that even Howard, abnormally busy as he was, took startled notice of her condition and, without consulting her, called in a doctor.

He was a very jolly and optimistic doctor, quite the antithesis of the type that fears the worst, but will do his best.

"You find it very dull here, I suppose," he observed, after a discussion of symptoms. "A small town has little to enliven the mind. I think you'll have to leave for a while—go to a pretty place—"

Evelyn paled and her hands, often shaking of late, grasped the chair-arms in terror.

"You mean—my mind—is failing?" she gasped. "Oh, no!" cried the astonished man. "What an idea! I mean that you're feeling flat—lifeless. I could give you a tonic, of course, and perhaps I shall, but your mind doesn't react to social influences and that upsets your whole organization. You're poisoned where you should be nourished. Get that?"

Evelyn did not reply. There was resistance in the set of her chin.

"You see, Mrs. Rockwell," he continued, leaning forward in an attitude of confidence, "when a man or woman goes flat, as I call it, no bounce to them—I spring my little joke. I tell them they haven't any spring in them, so I send them down to The Springs to get some!"

He laughed heartily at his threadbare pleasantry, and Evelyn found herself smiling faintly. So it was agreed that to The Springs she should go.

THE singsong throb of the wheels fitted the words of old songs. Evelyn found herself soothed by the rhythmic grinding. For the second lap of the journey she was compelled to take a chair-car, and carefully choosing the least strewn spot of a crummy passageway, she found a seat beside a weary-eyed and grimy little boy whose sagging mouth revealed rough-edged, untended teeth, and about whose neck was a sharply defined low-water line.

He studied his attractive fellow-passenger with innocent rudeness, and a girl from the opposite seat which had been turned to face him leaned across in worried reproof. "Don't stare so, Jamie," she whispered sharply.

Evelyn smiled down at the culprit, who blushed through his grime and turned his attention to the window panorama.

Beside the girl sat a very evident small sister. Both were red-cheeked and dark-eyed, almost pretty. They were, to Evelyn's appraising eyes, like pictures that would be charming if properly framed.

The older girl had been crying and to divert attention from herself she hastily began the readjustment of the wrinkled black ribbon that adorned the little sister's unevenly cut hair, the kind Evelyn knew would curl if it were coaxed.

"They are tired, aren't they?" Evelyn observed, eager to make a contact before the journey ended.

The older girl changed places with the boy and replied with a tearful gush of relief to the friendly words.

"They're all in, poor little kids, and—and I'm taking them to a Home because our mother is dead."

Evelyn was deeply touched. "Tell me," she said, her hand slipping over the unmanicured one in her neighbor's lap. Why, the girl was no older than Elinor.

"I can't support them—is all. And there isn't anybody else."

"No father?"

"No. Dad left when they were babies and we is heard he died in the oil-fields down in Oklahoma. I'd sure keep them if I could, but I can't do it. My job don't pay enough."

"Tell me your name—and the children's—it is terribly sad—" Evelyn grieved. Who knew what suffering was in the hearts of those all about them—older people too sophisticated to reveal their grief to a stranger as the girl had done. Insistently, she was reminded of her own children, happy and well groomed.

THE man in the seat behind straightened his coat, glanced curiously over the back of the seat at the smartly tailored woman who was interested in strange families and reclined again with his ear to the space between his own and his neighbor's chair. His yellowed fingers incessantly flipped forward and backward the corners of two trunk checks.

"I wish you'd quit that," complained his crudely rouged companion. "It gets on my nerves."

He lifted one yellow finger in a gesture of caution and nodded significantly in the direction of Evelyn and her troubled acquaintance.

"I'm Cora Sutter," the girl was saying. "That's Jamie and Florence, he's seven and she's six. She's nervous—something dreadful. I thought maybe they'd treat her for it—there." The girl's voice trailed to misery, and Evelyn patted her hand.

There was so little she could say. The treatment for a nervous child—even at the best of institutions—must be terribly inadequate. She remembered fearful nights with Howard, Jr., who persistently "heard things," and screamed for his mother.

"It sure is awful," sighed Cora Sutter. "But the Lord knows best, I guess and—they're real decent, for kids. Never any for me, though," she vowed grimly. "It's too big a chance unless you're rich and
